THE HISTORY OF FRANCE.
BOOK II.

Lewis VIII. or the Lion.

NO sooner was this prince crowned, with his queen Blanche, than an embassy arrived from England, Lewis demanding of him restitution of the dominions VIII. which the late king John held in France. Lewis pretended that they had been legally re-annexed to the French crown by his father, and that he himself was discharged of all obligations from the treaty he had entered into, by the same not having been observed on the part of the English government, who had obliged the French prisoners to pay their ransoms, and had refused to reinstate the barons in their privileges. This answer was backed by a strong army, and ibid. preceded by an alliance between Lewis, and Frederic, the German emperor; the latter promising never to assist England against France; and another with the count de Marche, husband to the queen dowager of England. In a short time, Lewis reduced Noirt, St. Joan d'Angeli, and Rochelle, though defended by Savari de Mauleon, one of the most accomplished captains of the age; but he was so ill supported by the English ministry, that he entered into the French service. Henry, who had taken the government into his own hands, was now master of no part of France but Bourdeaux, and the estates beyond the Garrone. But he knew that the people of Normandy, Poitou, and the other old possessions of his family in France, hated the French government, and were ready to embrace the first opportunity for shaking off their yoke. He created his brother Richard, who was earl of Cornwall in England, count of Poitou in France; and gave him the command of a considerable armament both by sea and land, of which he made so good a use, that he fixed in their duty the inhabitants of those places which still remained faithful to the Norman family, and protected others who had returned to the same allegiance, so that Lewis was obliged to agree to a triennial truce. His conduct on this occasion has been impeached by the French historians, and he seems to have been jealous of the credit of Aumery de Montfort, who had succeeded his father in the command of the crusade. He promised Aumery the high post of constable of France, the most important of any that could grace a French subject; and Aumery ceded to him the greatest part of the conquests which had been achieved by his father.

Mysterious history
of the count of Flanders.

Ferdinand, count of Flanders, had been a prisoner ever since the battle of Boxvines, and it was generally believed that the old count, who had been emperor of Constantinople, had been killed by the Bulgarians; but it is certain, that Ferdinand's wife, during her husband's imprisonment, governed that country. While Lewis was preparing to push the war against the Albingenses, a person all of a sudden appeared in Flanders, who pretended to have been the emperor Baldwin of Constantinople, and consequently lord of that country. His story was plausible. He related a wonderful series of adventures by which he effected his escape into Flanders; the identity of his person was recognized by the old men who remembered him before he went to Syria, and he was acknowledged by the people in general as their lawful sovereign, and received their oaths of fidelity. The regent countess accused him of being an impostor, and he was summoned to appear before the king at Peronne, which he did with great boldness. Some of the interrogatories put to him of incidents that happened before his leaving Flanders, seemed to perplex and confound him; but the reality of his person was so strongly averred, that Lewis dismissed him from his presence with a safe conduct. His deficiency in answering the questions put to him, began to raise, among the Flemings, a suspicion of his being an impostor, and, by degrees, his attendants diminished, so that the countess regent ordered him to be put to death, after having undergone the torture. This severity was looked upon with horror, because the identity of the old count's person was at least doubtful; and the inconstant Flemings reproached her with parricide.

The pope having prevailed in obliging Lewis, almost against his will, to put himself at the head of the crusade against the Albigenſes, who were now headed by the young count of Tholouſe, he marched with his army into Languedoc, where he demanded entrance into Avignon. This city had belonged to the kings of Naples and Sicily, as kings of Arles and Provence, and having protected many of the Albigenſes, it had been again and again devoted to deſtruction by the papal excommunications. The people offered to admit Lewis into their city, if he would give them any aſſurance of quarter, which he durſt not venture to do without the pope's leave. This rendered their defence very deſperate for eight months, and then Lewis, ſeeing his army reduced to a handful, by the ſword, diſtempers, and famine, granted them a capitulation.

Lewis was then preparing to return to Paris, but falling ſick on the road, he died at Montpenſier, in the thirty-ninth year of his age. Matthew Paris, the Engliſh hiſtorian, who lived at this time, tells us, that during the ſiege of Avignon, famine and peſtilence affected the French camp, and killed all kinds of cattle and beaſts of burden; that the French being obliged to forage at a great diſtance from their camp, were cut off by the friends of the beſieged, and parties from the town; that the vaſt numbers of dead bodies begat ſuch a number of gnats, flies, and vermin of every kind, as to render it impoſſible for the ſurvivors either to ſleep or eat with comfort, or ſafety. The king of France, upon this, ordered all the dead bodies to be thrown into the Rhone, and retired to Montpenſier, that he might avoid the infection. While he remained there, expecting every day to hear that the town was ſurrendered, Henry count of Champagne applied to him for leave to return home, the forty days being expired, for which he had engaged his ſervice. The king rejected his ſuit, and ſwore, that if he perſiſted in it, he would lay waſte the count's dominions with fire and ſword.

The ſame hiſtorian informs us, of a report then prevailing of the count's being deeply in love with the queen, which together with the affront he had received, induced him to give the king poiſon, and that it carried him off. The legates and prelates about his perſon gave out, upon the death of Lewis, that he was only indiſpoſed, but that he would recover in a ſhort time; and that his orders to the general officers of his army, were to puſh the ſiege with all imaginable vigour. The citizens, however, continuing to make a reſolute defence, the legates thought proper to mention an accommodation, and to invite twelve of the chief citizens to a conference; to which they repaired accordingly. The legate then propoſed that he and the other prelates, with only their trains, might be permitted to enter their city, to diſcourſe with the inhabitants concerning the ſtate of their ſouls, and that they might have an opportunity of clearing them to his holiness from the imputation of heresy. The deputies declared that their countrymen were resolved to endure all extremities rather than submit to French tyranny ; but the prelates taking a solemn oath that they meant no more than they pretended, the deputies were, with great difficulty, prevailed upon to carry them with them into the town. The gates being opened, a party of the French, as had been preconcerted, rushed in, and mastering the centinels, put the inhabitants to the sword, and became masters of the city, which they plundered.

Reflections on his character.

We have thought proper to be the more explicit in our relation from so unexceptionable an author as Matthew Paris was, of this king's death, that the reader may have a fresh opportunity of detesting the villainous arts and impostures of the Romish clergy at this time, especially as we can scarcely fix upon any period in which their power was at a greater height. With regard to the character of Lewis VIII. its complexion partakes of that of the clergy. The people of England certainly believed that he intended to have extirminated all their great men for having been rebels to their own native prince.

Lewis, when in England, could maintain his footing no longer than the pope pleased, and his legate dictated the terms in which he was to leave it. Lewis refused to comply with those terms, for which he was excommunicated, obliged to perform penance in his own person, and to forfeit to the apostolic chamber a tenth of his revenue for two years. His officers were taxed at a twentieth, and his chaplains were obliged to repair to Rome for absolution ; which they purchased by appearing at the door of the cathedral church at Paris, barefooted, and in their shirts, they carrying, at the four great feasts in the year, in their hands, whips, or disciplines, which were to be applied to their backs by the canons.

The submission of Lewis and his father to those infamous mortifications, have with churchmen covered the shameful transactions of their reigns, and obliterated the infamy of their having been, in the hands of popes, the scourges of a brave and virtuous people ; we mean the Albingerse. Officious churchmen have for the same reason decorated them with fictitious, and indeed with ridiculous, virtues ; for they have made Lewis willing to submit to death rather than violate his marriage vows, by admitting a young maid to his embraces, though it is certain, that his own queen Blanche, was one of the handsomest women of her age.

Lewis IX. commonly called St. Lewis.

IT is said that Lewis VIII. in his life time, exacted from The state his nobles and clergy an oath, that they would place the of France, crown, upon his decease, on the head of this young prince, who was twelve years of age at the time of his accession. The court of France was, at this time, in a most disordered situation, through the variety of characters which composed it. Philip Augustus, though we are ignorant of the precise æra of its commencement, had instituted a court, which is now known by the name of the Twelve Peers of France, and they pretended to extraordinary jurisdictions, especially in the coronations, if not election of their kings, as the extinction of the hereditary right in the Carlovingian line was yet recent. They had seen the great diminution of their importance of late years, and they thought that a minority was the only favourable time for their recovering it; but, whatever claims of election they might have, the French nation had never yet disputed the right of a prince who had been regularly crowned.

The queen, with all her appearances of state and piety, during had a heart not unsusceptible of love, and the count of the mino-Champagne, whom some call Henry, and some Theobald, rity of though the latter seems to have been his true name, was Lewis IX. her perfect admirer, and celebrated her charms in poetry. He inherited the crown of Navarre, in right of his mother, Blanche de Navarre, sister of Sancho the Strong; and the passion and nature which breathed in his lines discovered him to have been sincere in his addresses. His rival (and a favoured one too, as is suspected) was Bonaventure, the cardinal legate; and the preference which Theobald imagined was given to this ecclesiastic, drove him into opposition to the queen, who was served with able ministers. The chief was the bishop of Senlis, through whom the glorious battle of Bouvines had been gained, and who was now chancellor of France, and, consequently, at the head of the administration.

Philip Augustus, in settling his court of peers, had, in conformity with the feudal laws then in use, and which, before that time, was common in England, annexed the dignity of peerage to certain offices of great trust and honour, such as those of chancellor, constable, butler, and chamberlain; and the queen having those upon her side, was the less sollicitous about the attendance of the other great peers, who pretended their presence to be necessary for authenticating the ceremony. Bonaventure, and the chancellor, were of opinion, that she ought to risk every thing rather than admit of this claim; and orders were given for arresting the count of Champagne, who threatened to disturb the ceremony, if he should come to Rheims; for which reason he absented himself. Notwithstanding that, his wife, the countess, laid claim to the office of carrying the sword of state on the day of coronation; but it was disputed by the countess of Flanders, whose husband was still in prison.

Disputes
about his coronation.

The dispute was decided in favour of Philip, count of Boulogne, uncle to the king, but with a salvo to both their claims. The truth is, the queen, by the advice of her council, had very wisely resolved that the coronation should be performed, which it accordingly was, without any claims of the great land feudatories being admitted; by which their order received a mortal blow in France, where no regard has been since had to any voice they have in electing a king. The heads of the opposition to the court, on this occasion were, Robert, count of Dreux, and duke of Bretagne, by his wife the countess of Flanders, who hated the queen regent; with the powerful counts of Champagne, Thelouse, and Provence. The count of Boulogne, uncle to the king, was likewise discontented, without his appearing to be so; but the politic Blanche soon found means to dissipate the whole of this threatening conspiracy, and to establish the regal authority more firmly than ever in Lewis.

Divisions
state.

She knew the ascendancy she had over the mind of the count of Champagne, and, partly by her authority, partly by blandishments, she brought him to humble himself at her feet. Perceiving that the active countess of Flanders had in her eye a second husband (her former being still a prisoner) in the person of the count of Bretagne, she set the first husband at liberty, and thereby prevented that dangerous alliance. She bribed the earl of Kent, first minister to Henry III. of England, in whom the confederates trusted as the main spring of their alliance, and the English armaments were so retarded, that the operations of the allies could not proceed; and thus the French government, for some time, enjoyed repose; but it was soon destroyed.

Philip, count of Boulogne, being apprehensive from the example of the count of Flanders, that the queen would set at liberty his father-in-law the old count of Boulogne, who likewise had remained a prisoner ever since the battle of Bouvines, joined the confederates, and a scheme was formed for seizing the person of the king. The plot was privately discovered by the count de Champagne, to the queen, and the Parisians escorted his majesty to his capital.

Soon after, the count of Bretagne, who had been disappointed in marrying the countess of Flanders, broke into open rebellion, and having a secret intelligence with the heads of the malecontents, they appeared so thinly in defence of the king, that he was upon the point of falling into the count's hands, when he was rescued by the count of Champagne, who had been privy to the confederacy, but now appeared on the king's side, with a force that obliged the count of Bretagne to receive law from the queen regent. The earl of Tholouse had, by this time, recovered great part of his patrimonial dominions from the talons of the church, and was the most considerable of the confederates who remained unreduced. The queen regent made so good use of the credit she had with the legate, that she revived the army of the crusaders of the church.

The inhuman war against the Albigeneses was renewed under Imbert de Beaujou, governor of Languedoc, who put to death all the Albigeneses to death, either by fire or sword, particularly all that were found within the castle of Bontequ, Albigen-near Tholouse. This barbarity was committed by the advice of the bishop of Carcassone, and Amelin, the pope's legate in those parts; but it was so far from depressing the Albigeneses, that they grew more powerful than ever; and, after taking Sarazin, and other places of great importance, from Imbert, the latter was obliged to remove to France, when he returned in the year 1228, with a fresh supply of crusaders, under the archbishops of Bourges, Auch, and Bordeaux. Raymond, earl of Tholouse, could not withstand the storm, and being, besides, a prince of a soft, timid disposition, he shut himself up in Tholouse, where hardships and famine soon compelled him to listen to proposals sent him by the pope's legate, through the abbot of Grandseve. A truce and a meeting being agreed upon, he was persuaded to have an interview with the queen regent at Meaux, where, against all law and good faith, he found himself a prisoner. It is observable, that the more devoted the people of those days were to the Roman pontiff, they were the more disregarding of every virtue that ought to characterize the human species.

The earl, instead of being admitted to make terms, was obliged to receive them, and those too of the hardest digestion, and in the most infamous manner. He was forced to appear before the altar in his shirt and drawers, with a torch in his hand, and to beg pardon for all he had done against the church, and to promise to defend the faith, and banish and expel all the heretics out of his territories. He was to pay immense sums for the propagation of the Roman catholic religion; to take upon himself the crusade for five years, and not to return to Tholouse without a certificate of his good behaviour under the hand of the great master of Rhodes. He was to demolish the fortifications of Tholouse, and of five and thirty cities and castles in his dominions, and never to rebuild them without the pope's leave. He was to deliver into the hands of the legate all those castles and cities with Penne d'Agènes, for eight years ; and he was obliged to make war with such of his subjects as should refuse to comply with the terms of the treaty ; nay, if he was unable to reduce them himself, he was to employ the Knights Templars, who were to conquer the possessions of the rebels, and hold them for themselves. . But the most important part of the treaty was, that, for the full accomplishment of all this, he should resign himself a prisoner into the hands of the king at the Louvre in Paris, from whence he should not depart till he had first caused his daughter to be brought to Carcaffone, and committed to the custody of the king, into the hands of those persons whom he should appoint and depute for that purpose.

The shameful treaty he is obliged to make. Besides those and many other shameful articles, the count bound himself to make war upon his friend the earl of Foix, and never to make peace with him, but by the legate's permission. The performance of this treaty came next under consideration. Certain statutes were drawn up, to which the count was obliged to agree.

First, to facilitate the payment of the respective sums, which he had bound and obliged himself to pay towards the convents, by way of penalty ; they caused him to command and enjoin, that all his subjects who made profession of the faith of the Albingses, should furnish him with a mark of silver a head. And this was to persuade him, that he ought not to look upon that condemnation as strange and severe, since the payment of the said sums would wholly lie upon the Albingses. Moreover, by this means, they put all his subjects to the test ; for so many as should refuse to pay the said mark of silver, were thereby known and taken notice of, so that it was a kind of inquisition, to single out, and discover all such as should be afterwards persecuted. And that such as should continue and persevere in their religion, should be punished and sentenced to death, their goods confiscated, their wills rendered invalid and of none effect ; so that neither their children, nor any of their relations, could recover or enjoy their inheritance.

Secondly, That their houses should be utterly levelled and demolished.

Thirdly, He did likewise command and ordain, that all those who should refuse the inquisitors their houses, farms and woods, or should protect and defend the heretics, rescue and deliver them when they were taken, should deny the inquisitors their aid and assistance, or refuse to vindicate and defend them when they required it, or should not do their best endeavours to keep and secure such as the said inquisitors should apprehend, should suffer corporal punishment, and have their goods confiscated.

Fourthly,

Fourthly, Item, That those who were suspected of heresy, shall take their oaths to live in obedience to the catholic faith, and renounce and abjure their heresy; and if they shall refuse so to do, they shall suffer the same punishment as the heretics. But, if after the oath taken, it doth appear, that they have received, favoured, or advised any heretics, they shall suffer whatsoever punishment the council shall think fit to inflict upon them.

Lastly, We moreover ordain, if it shall appear, that any one who hath been an offender shall die an heretic, and that sufficiently proved and made out before the bishop; that his goods shall be confiscated, and the houses wherein he shall have dwelt since the treaty of peace made at Paris, or wherein he shall dwell hereafter, shall be utterly razed and demolished.

We have been the more solicitous to preserve the memory of this negotiation, which was one of the most important ever concluded on the part of the French crown, because its cruel and tyrannical conditions have been stifled by most, if not all, the popish historians, and are but ill understood by the protestants.

A council was called in 1229, at which the archbishops of Narbonne, Bordeaux, and Auch, with several other prelates, assisted; and, by its seventh canon, a severe prohibition was laid against the laity reading or translating the holy scriptures; and Gregory IX. published an ordinance, that all laymen, of what rank or quality soever, should be prohibited from preaching.

All this while, the earl of Tholouse was detained close prisoner; and remained so till the sums, in which he was fined, were paid; the walls of Tholouse demolished; and his only daughter and child, Joan, who was no more than nine years of age, was put into the hands of the queen-mother, to be by her educated till she was married to her second son, Alonso Colmieu, one of the legates, imposed his commands on the count of Tholouse, to write to the count of Foix, which he did, in friendly but pressing terms, to submit to the see of Rome; but the count stood out with a noble disdain. The legate then applied his batteries to the count's subjects, who earnestly pressed him to comply, and, at last, he had an interview with cardinal Ange, another legate, and some of the chief French clergy, at St. Jean de Berges. There the legate spared no pains to prevail with him to submit to the pope; and the count, finding that, at last, he must be forced, and that his dominions would be exposed to the most cruel devastations, he agreed to put five of his castles into the legate's hands. His example was followed by the count of Comminge and the prince of Bearne, who were unable, of themselves, to resist such a torrent of oppression. It was owing to the above negotiation that the noble noble county of Toulouse, soon after, was united to the crown of France.

Privileges of the great lords reduced. It was, perhaps, owing to the pope, that the queen-regent and her son did not, at this time, entirely abolish the privileges of the great lords; but she depended on the clergy for money, and they made their own terms, which were not over favourable for the crown; and this lead her to mild measures; which succeeded so well, that she brought many of the great tenants of the crown to their duty. A party, however, still held out; who endeavoured to bring the count of Champagne to head them, by offering to him in marriage the daughter of the count of Bretagne. The count, whatever passion he might still entertain for the queen, was ready to have celebrated the marriage, when a stop was put to the match by the king; whom the count so far obeyed, that he withdrew from his engagements with the malecontents. The queen of Cyprus had strong pretensions to the count's dominions, and they invited her to head them. They accordingly invaded his country; but he was so powerfully protected by the king, that they were forced to retire. The king and the queen-mother laid hold of the queen's claim to reduce the power of the count, whose inconstancy had given them so much trouble; for, under pretence of satisfying her claim, they obliged the count to sell part of his dominions.

Opposition of the count of Boulogne. The count of Boulogne, brother to the late king, was at the head of this party in the opposition; and the queen had the art to balance his interest by that of the count of Flanders. They had flattered the count of Boulogne with hopes of the French crown, founded on the pretended rights of election, which they revived on this occasion; but the queen, at last, succeeded in convincing the count, that the real intention of the malecontents was to give the crown to Enguerand de Couci, whose claim was from Charles the Great, and was favoured by the emperor. The count, convinced by her reasons, entirely abandoned the cause of the malecontents, accepted of a pension, and was reconciled to his nephew.

Wise government of the queen-mother, The count of Bretagne remained still to be gained over to the royal party. He was powerful, obstinate, and supported by the king of England. The queen-mother had made so good use of her money, that she had either brought over all the inferior malecontents, or had rendered them so distrustful of each other, that they never could make a decisive push. The count of Bretagne continued in arms; but the queen-mother having gained over the heads of the English ministry, Henry III. was betrayed in all the attempts he made to assist him; so that, after stripping the count of his chief fortresses, she obliged him to make his submissions, and Henry to accept of a triennial truce.

The

The court and kingdom of France having thus gained some repose, the queen-mother had many reasons that determined her to marry her son. He was then nineteen years of age, of a majestic appearance, full of courage and spirit, and his judgment was excellent. In short, nature had furnished him with every qualification that could constitute a great prince. Queen Blanche, whose ruling passion was power, and who was resolved to retain it in her own hands as long as she could, observed the growing qualities of her son, and was determined to render them as useless as possible, both to himself and his people. For this purpose, she put him into the hands of gloomy clergymen; who gave him an education so religious, that it turned his excellent natural endowments into poison to the quiet and welfare of his people. Though humane, beneficent, and just, those amiable virtues lost their names, when the wills of popes or priests opposed them; and none were suffered to approach his person, who could instruct him in the real duties that a great prince owed to himself and his subjects. Margaret, daughter to the count of Provence, was the lady whom the queen pitched upon to be her son's consort; and, after the marriage was celebrated, she found her authority more strengthened than ever, by the king reposing upon her entirely the cares of government. None, however, were found hardy enough to blame her administration, which was in every respect faultless; and she exerted in herself that spirit, and those civil virtues, which she sought to suppress in her son.

But her conduct, though not attacked, was not un- who gorepined at in secret, especially by the great nobility; who verns found themselves, by her means, excluded from all posts of France af-power and profit under the crown. The count of Bretagne ter her son renewed his attachments with the English monarch, a weak, is of age.
unsteady prince, and possessed of little real power, because he was perpetually at variance with his parliament. He encouraged the count in his discontent; but the queen-mother effectually humbled him, by sending her son against him at the head of an army. The count applied to the English monarch to make good his promises of assistance; but Henry being unable, the count was obliged to throw himself at the king's feet with a halter about his neck, and obtained his pardon.

In the year 1234, Lewis was twenty-one years of age; but his mother continued to be, as absolutely as ever, mistress of the government, though she dropped the title of regent. The count of Champagne was now become, in his mother's right, king of Navarre; and being immensely rich, he sought to repurchase the estates which he had, some years before, parted with; but the regal power interposed, and put a bar to the re-annexation.

The rage of crusading was, at that time, revived in France, and served many purposes of ambition and vanity. The

A crusade new king of Navarre found he must make but a poor figure under the if confined to his French dominions, where the queen-mother's authority was so well established; and, being under king of no apprehensions from the Spaniards, he resolved to take Navarre. upon himself the cross; and his royal dignity procured him many followers; particularly Hugh, duke of Burgundy; Peter de Dreux, surnamed Illclerk, duke of Bretagne; John, his brother, count de Brain and Mascon; Henry, count de Bar; Guy, count de Nevers; the constable Amauri, count de Montfort; the counts de Joigni and Sancerre; and many other barons of France, Navarre, and Bretagne; as, the counts Guionar, de Leon, Henry de Goetlo, Andrew de Vitrey, Raoul de Fougères, Geoffrey de Avesnes, and Fouques Paynel.

We have, in the place referred to, given a detail of this crusade, and shall not repeat it here. It must, however, be observed, that the affairs both of Europe and Asia underwent, about this time, a total alteration by the progress of Jenghiz Khan's arms. This, perhaps, was the reason why, about the year 1238, several of the Asiatic princes courted the friendship of Lewis; whose reputation was so great, that it is said to have disarmed two of the old man of the mountain's subjects, whom he had sent to assassinate Lewis.

Upon the return of the French crusaders, the court of Lewis was magnificent and splendid, and the kingdom tranquil. He had made noble provisions for his brothers; but this serenity was soon overcast. The count de la Marche, husband to the queen dowager of England, formed a confederacy against the court of Lewis. The young count of Bretagne entered into it, as did the count of Tholouse, from resentment of his family wrongs; but all of them expected to be supported by English money. The count of Marche was pressed by his wife, a haughty princess, who disdained that queen Blanche should be her superior; and he offered, if Henry would furnish him with money only, to retake all that his family had lost in France. Henry, flattered by those promises, called a parliament at London; but he found the members backward in falling in with his views. They charged the count of Marche with having imposed upon their king, and with having treated themselves contemptuously, by demanding the assistance of their money and not of their arms. The king endeavoured, but in vain, to soothe them into a compliance with his will; but they resented his entering into any engagements with the count of Marche or the French nobility, without their consent and advice.

Henry persisted obstinately in his purpose, raised money at an exorbitant interest, and fitted out both a fleet and an army. Lewis did the same. The rendezvous of his ships was at Rochelle, and his subjects united in his defence. Henry, in May, 1242, embarked his army in about three hundred vessels, and landed at Rouen, attended by his queen, his brother brother Richard, king of the Romans, and seven of his great officers of state. His conduct was as wavering and pusillanimous, as that of Lewis was firm and resolute. The latter Lewis offered Henry peace upon reasonable conditions, but it was beats the rejected, and Lewis twice beat the confederates; who, being disappointed of money, soon made an end of all their performances and engagements with Henry. The count de la Marche submitted to Lewis, and Henry retired to Bordeaux. Any other prince but he, might, at this time, have shaken the throne of France; but the malecontents durst not trust him; and they were, one after another, reduced to a sense of their duty; leaving Lewis in the glorious and tranquil possession of his throne.

He had, with secret indignation, observed that one of the greatest miseries to which his empire was subjected, lay in capital the intermarriages of foreigners with the daughters of his great lords; by which some of the best estates in France descended to strangers. This mode of succession was productive of the worst consequences, by often embroiling the crown of France with the princes whose natural born subjects those strangers were. The French, in general, as well as Lewis, were sensible of the evil; and, in a parliament, or general meeting of the states, it was enacted, that French subjects should not, without the king's permission, give their daughters in marriage to foreigners. Another capital disadvantage, which the French monarchy laboured under at the same time, was the double homages paid by its subjects to Lewis and the king of England. This was an inconvenience which had its root in the nature of the feudal constitutions, and was to be conquered only by Lewis obliging every French subject to make his election to which prince he was to pay his homage. If to Lewis, then Henry, or whoever held the crown of England, seized all the lands such vassals held of him. If to the English crown, the French fiefs were forfeited by Lewis. To remedy, as far as possible, the glaring injustice which this option introduced, Lewis gave orders for such of his subjects, whose lands were seized by the English, to be indemnified out of the forfeitures of the English to his crown.

Though Lewis had been educated in the most slavish conformity to the Romish church and discipline, yet he knew how to make the proper distinctions between the temporal and spiritual concerns of his holiness. He declined taking any immediate interest in the quarrel between the emperor and pope Innocent IV. when the latter was driven from Rome to Lyons, which did not then belong to the French crown. He gave way, however, to Innocent's celebrating a magnificent council in that city; and he had the glory of being proposed by the emperor of Germany as the arbiter of the differences between himself and the pope. Lewis wisely declined taking any any decisive part in their differences, because he condemned the excesses of both ; but he did all he could to reconcile them, though without effect. He did not, however, suffer the frantic haughtiness of the pontiff to break into the police of his kingdom. He refused to suffer excommunications to operate, as the pope contended they should; in civil matters, by the parties who fell under them, forfeiting their rights to all their civil property, whether the sentence was just or unjust ; and, by a prudent œconomy, he regulated his finances so as to become, by the twenty-fourth year of his age, the richest and most formidable prince in Europe. The two battles which he had gained over Henry III. of England; particularly that of Taillebourg, had raised his military character ; and, by seasonable re-annexations and prudent purchases, he had enlarged the demesnes of the crown, which were his sole dependence; far beyond what they had been since the extinction of the Carlovingian race.

He falls ill and takes the cross. Thus far Lewis IX. may be said to have been born for the happiness of his people and the glory of the human species. But his lustre was too intense to last ; and the fatal twist towards religion which he had received in his youth, soon produced fatal effects. About the year 1244, Lewis was attacked by a dangerous malady, which seems to have affected his brain ; for, during its paroxysms, he was delirious, and raved about taking the cross. For twenty-four hours, he seemed to be without sensation ; but when he recovered his usual health, the impression of the obligation he was under to take the cross still remained upon his mind. He imagined that, while he was ill, a voice from heaven had commanded him to march against the infidels ; and, that his recovery was owing to a resolution of obeying the holy warning. In vain did his wife and mother, with the wisest and ablest of his nobles and counsellors, endeavour to divert him from the prosecution of this frantic purpose ; and even the bishop of Paris added his earnest exhortations to dissuade him.

His great preparations for a crusade. All that Lewis could be brought to consent to, was, to delay his expedition till he could put matters upon such a footing, that his embarking in it could be of no disservice to the internal quiet of his kingdom. He disarmed the count of Tholouse, whom he had pardoned for his last revolt, and put him out of any condition to renew the war, be the opportunity ever so inviting. He, with great difficulty, procured the consent of the states of his kingdom to his expedition. He renewed his endeavours, but without success, to reconcile the pope to the emperor, Frederic; and had, for that purpose, an interview with his holiness. The count of Provence, father-in-law both to Lewis and Henry III. of England, had only daughters to succeed him in his vast possessions, which, after his death, he had bequeathed to his youngest daughter, Beatrice; so that the proper disposition of of that princess in marriage, was a capital point for the quiet of France. Lewis discovered great address and abilities in managing that matter so that Beatrix, notwithstanding all the opposition raised by the English court and the great lords of France, became the wife of his brother Charles. He obtained permission from his holiness to levy the tenth of his clergy's revenues for the support of his expedition; but when the pope attempted to impose, by his own authority, a like tax, which was to be employed in the private quarrel between him and the emperor, Lewis interposed, and, to the infinite joy of the clergy, stopped the payment.

So conscientious was Lewis in every thing relating to his expedition, that he gave public notice for all who conceived themselves to have been aggrieved or injured by him, to exhibit their cases, that they might receive satisfaction. Henry III. of England laid hold of this invitation; and sent over to his brother, Richard, earl of Cornwall; who, in Henry's name, demanded restitution of his duchy of Normandy, of which, he said, he had been wrongfully deprived. Lewis referred the demand to the bishops of Normandy, who adjudged it to be frivolous; and all that Lewis could be brought to agree to was a renewal of the truce under the guaranty of his holiness. All the other dispositions made by Lewis, upon this frantic occasion, discovered the most profound policy and soundness of judgment.

The equanimity with which he had conducted himself in the dispute between the pope and the emperor, had won the hearts of both; and the latter not only gave him, by his celebrated chancellor, Peter de Vignes, the most express assurances of his intending to take no advantage against France during his absence, but issued out orders to all his governors and officers for furnishing the crusaders under Lewis with all kinds of provisions and necessaries; by which his magazines were regularly and plentifully supplied. It was in this wise providence for the subsistence of his troops, that the expedition of Lewis to the Holy Land differed essentially from those that preceded it, where warmth and enthusiasm supplied all care and foresight.

Lewis was equally provident for the tranquillity of his kingdom as for the success of his arms. He had few or no resources but in his own demesne, or what may be called his family estate. Feudal service was all he could demand from his great lords; but these were confined to a certain number of days, generally forty; and all the time over, if the king detained his vassals troops, was to be paid by himself. The great land-holders, or feudatories, in France, were then so free, that the king could impose upon them no extra-feudal tax; nor were they so fond of calling together the assembly of their states as the kings of England were. The two kingdoms, though their feudal constitutions resembled each other, differed in that respect; as the power of the king of England

England was more compact, and less subject to foreign influence, than that of the king of France; but chiefly, as the great tenants in capite, belonging to the king of England, were obliged to attend their sovereign to foreign parts; which many of them willingly did, as the greatest part of their estates often lay in France. Such of them as had no possessions but in England, being suffered to pay an exscuage, or fine, for excusing their attendance, those exscuages became soon a capital part of the royal revenue of England.

History Lewis was so well beloved, and his authority so firmly and death established, that he was less cautious than his predecessors of Rai- had been, in convoking those assemblies; but some favoura-mond, the ble incidents, which happened during his preparations, co-

Tholouse. off all the pecuniary penalties that had been imposed upon him; and, being of a more pliable disposition than his father, had admitted the popish inquisitors into his country; where they were guilty of such oppressions, that many of them were killed by the inhabitants. This might have had terrible consequences, in stirring up a fresh crusade, had not the main expedition under the king been in agitation; and had not Raimond, by the most solemn attestations, purged himself of all concern in the riot. Before the grand expedition took place, he went to Rome, to solicit the favour of leave to bury his father's bones in consecrated ground; but it was denied him, because that prince had died excommunicated. Raimond, in returning to his own dominions, died at Milan; upon which, Alonso, brother to Lewis, entered into possession of his estates, in right of his wife, Joan, who was Raimond's daughter and heiress. The county of Tholouse was so important an acquisition to the royal family of France, that it delayed the crusade for some months, till Alonso could be firmly settled in the succession.

Their three wives, as well as the queen-consort, took the cross, and shared in the fatigues of the expedition. The zeal of Lewis was such as converted him into a preacher for the crusade; and he prevailed on all his subjects, whom he suspected of raising commotions in his absence, to follow his example. These were Hugh, duke of Burgundy; Peter, duke of Bretagne; William, earl of Flanders; Hugh de Chastillon, count of St. Paul; and Gautier de Chastillon, his nephew; Hugh de Lusignan, earl of Marche, and his son, Hugh de Brown, followed them; together with the counts de Dreux, de Bar, de Soissons, de Blois, de Retel, de Montfort,
 and

and de Vendosme. The lords, John de Beaujeu; Philip de Courtenay; Guion de Flandres; Archambald de Bourbon, the younger; Raoul de Couci; John de Barres; Gaubert and John de Apremont; Giles de Mailli; Robert de Bethune, of Arras; Olivier de Termes; Simon, count de Sabruc; and lord de Commerci. Besides those, the famous Joinville, the statesman and historian of the times, served in this expedition; as did a number of prelates. We are not, however, to suppose that all those illustrious personages sailed at the same time; some of them being left behind to bring up recruits, and for other purposes. Before Lewis sailed, he annexed the county of Mascon to the crown, by purchasing it of the countess, who retired to a convent. He then appointed the queen-mother regent of his kingdom during his absence; and, in the year 1248, the expedition set sail, in two divisions; one, carrying the king and queen, from Aigues Mortes, and the other from Marseilles.

We have, in a former part of this work, been diffuse up- See on the history of this unhappy crusade, and of the state of Vol. VII. Syria, Egypt, and Persia, when it was undertaken. We gave p. 254, &c. our readers more ample information on that head than can be found in any other work; and we corrected the mistakes of all other historians, by drawing our authorities from Moslem as well as Christian writers; and therefore we shall repeat no part that we have already related.

According to the best accounts, Lewis had not in his ar- Strength my above sixty thousand fighting men; but they were and ex- Frenchmen, devoted to his person and cause, under excellent pence of discipline; and a greater number would only have embar- the French rassed him. The number of his ships which carried this army. armament, are said to have been eighteen hundred; all of them built in French ports. Three thousand of his officers were knights-bannerets, one hundred and seventy-two of whom he maintained at his own table; and he paid such of his great lords, who were unable to maintain their followers, so much a head, out of his own pocket.

The injustice and folly of this expedition never once suggested themselves to Lewis or his followers, because their heads were filled with the fumes of superstition and devotion. His first capital error consisted in the long stay he made in the kingdom of Cyprus, where he appointed his rendezvous, and where, through the unwholesomeness of the air and water, he lost some of his best troops and officers, particularly the last of the Archibaulds of Bourbon, from whom the present kings of France and Spain are descended, by one of their ancestors marrying a daughter of that house. Perhaps the vast delay which Lewis made, between the time of his taking the cross and sailing upon the expedition, might have contributed not a little, as well as the too long stay he made at Cyprus, to its unfortunate event. The infidels in

The successes of Lewis, as we have already seen, were, at first, amazing and rapid; and if, instead of engaging Najmoddin in Syria, he had marched towards Cairo, that city, and all Egypt, must have fallen into his hands; but even his conquests ruined his army, notwithstanding the numerous reinforcements it received. The luxuries of the climate introduced dissolution of manners, and all discipline was lost among the soldiers. Lewis, after beating the infidels at Almansurah, where he lost his brother, the count of Artois, with two thousand of his bravest troops, when it was too late, pushed on towards Egypt; but lost the command of the navigation of the Nile, and consequently of all conveyance of provisions to his army; which, by diseases multiplying, were reduced to a handful, on a spot between Almansurah and Damiata.

Lewis and his officers made prisoners. Lewis, notwithstanding all his misfortunes, disdained to be any thing less than a king, and rejected the servile conditions prescribed to him by Moadhdhem, the infidel sultan; but, at last, he and his remaining chief officers, were constrained to surrender themselves prisoners at discretion to the barbarians. His behaviour, under his misfortunes, was firm and magnanimous; and he struck the infidels themselves with admiration of his virtues. They butchered the common men; nor had they any rule for saving the others but the richness of their armour, which gave them hopes of a large ransom.

It is certain that the state of Moadhdhem's affairs contributed to the deliverance of Lewis, who must otherwise have fallen a sacrifice to the barbarity, avarice, and superstition, of the infidel emirs and general officers of the Egyptian Mamlucks; who, instigated by Moadhdhem's sister, Sajr al Dor, murdered Moadhdhem in the presence of Lewis.

He regains his liberty.

We have, in the passages referred to, given the sequel of this tragedy, so far as it related to Lewis, who might have received the crown of Egypt, in a present from the emirs, if he would have conformed to their superstitions. After Lewis had given orders for the surrender of Damiata, which, during his expedition into Egypt, had been held by his queen, the duke of Burgundy, and many other French nobility, with a strong garrison, and a fleet consisting of Pisan and Genoese ships, he followed his queen to Acon. Lewis had left his brother, the count of Poitiers, a hostage, in the hands of the infidels, for the payment of the first moiety of his ransom; thirty thousand crowns of which being deficient, he obliged the Knights Templars, much against their inclination, to advance it; upon which the count immediately regained his liberty.

The

The joy of the French, in hearing the first successes of Lewis, was soon damped by the news of his captivity. Upon his arrival at Acon, he was still master of a very respectable force, both by sea and land; and his best friends were for his immediately returning to France, to prevent the English taking advantage of the expiration of the truce, which was at hand; and to resettle the affairs of government, which were daily suffering by his absence. Lewis, who was always romantically religious, made a scruple of leaving Syria before he had delivered the Christians of that country from their melancholy condition.

In the mean while, a Cistercian monk, whom some writers report to have been an agent for the Syrian and Egyptian infidels, came from Germany to France; where pretending to a divine commission, and to frequent revelations, he preached up a crusade for the deliverance of Lewis. His success was such as almost desolated the country of France. The lower people left their manual employments to follow him. Agriculture and manufactures were thrown aside; and the rising, from the quality of those who attended it; and from their having a lamb painted in their colours, was called, "The Crusade of the Shepherds." In fact, the insurgents were the most abandoned of all wretches; and having long been, through the absence of the king and the great lords, under no controul, they had indulged themselves in robberies and wickedness of every kind.

captivity.

The monk exercised over them a despotic power; he gave them leaders, temporal as well as spiritual, with a new system of religion; by which they were bound, in conscience, to hold the dictates of their leader, be they ever so impious, as sacred; and to exterminate the orders of priests and monks wherever they fell in their way, on pretext that their dissolute lives had drawn down the judgments of Heaven upon the king. Those wretches, after domineering in the Orleannois, were proceeding in their excesses, when the gentlemen of Berry, and the adjacent provinces, were obliged to associate themselves in their own defence, and, by a reasonable firmness, a stop was put to the insurrection; but not before its leader, and great numbers of the insurgents, were cut in pieces between Mortamer and Villeneuve upon the Char.

A dangerous insurrection

Those distractions, and the grief for her son's captivity, Lewis greatly affected the queen-mother, who had, for some time, solved too much neglected the government, and retired to a monastery of her own foundation. Lewis was then at Acon, in Palestine, where he had released all the infidel prisoners that were in his custody, and sent ships, in terms of the late treaty, for bringing off the Christian captives, who, to the amount of twelve thousand, were still in the hands of the Egyptians. The inconstancy, rapaciousness, and treachery of the latter, at this time, was almost incredible. No sooner was Lewis out of their power, than they repented of the treaty they had made; and, instead of setting the prisoners at liberty, they detained all but four hundred of them in chains at Cairo; and barbarously put out the eyes of three hundred of the bravest among them, and, in that condition, sent them to Lewis; who was so much affected at the sight, that he is said to have founded an hospital, which remains to this day, where three hundred blind people are maintained. As to the remainder of the captives, the infidels are said to have put many of them to death, or to have forced them to renounce Christianity.

Lewis, upon so many dismal events, called together an assembly of princes and lords belonging to Palestine and Syria, as well as to France, to deliberate upon the course he was to hold; and he gave them eight days to consider, whether they thought it expedient that they should return to France or remain in Palestine. The time being expired, the members were divided. The majority of the French noblemen were for his immediate return to France, as his army had been so much reduced; but even this advice, sound and rational as it was, they were obliged to sweeten to the king's palate, by promising to attend him again to Egypt, after the affairs of his own kingdom were settled, to revenge the death of their companions. On the other hand, the Knights Templars and Hospitallers urged the honour of the king, which did not admit of his leaving a country where so many Christians were languishing in captivity; and which, the moment he abandoned it, must revert to the power of the infidels. They observed, that the circumstances of Lewis, even in Palestine, were far from being so desperate as to oblige him to so dishonourable a step; that he was still master of great treasures, by which he might recruit his armies: and, that the dissensions which prevailed among the infidels, presented him with an almost certain prospect of his becoming master of Egypt and Syria. Both sides having delivered their opinion, Lewis, after deliberating eight days longer, sided with the latter, on the presumption, that the wisdom and experience of the queen-mother (who was then alive) would prevent France from receiving any internal detriment; but, at the same time, he gave leave for as many of his followers, as pleased, to return home.

He obtains great credit

Lewis delivered this opinion in a most solemn, pathetic manner, and before a full assembly. The French who attended him, though they bewailed his resolution, were too brave, and too generous to abandon him, and Lewis sent back to France his two brothers, with an excellent letter of advice, which is still extant. Upon their departure, Lewis received compliments of condolence from the Christian powers, and particularly pope Innocent, who then resided at Lyons. The differences among the infidels procured him him likewise an embassy from Naser, prince of Aleppo and Damascus, who offered to join his forces with his against the Mamluks of Egypt, with a promise to surrender him the kingdom of Jerusalem. Lewis inclined to accept of this proposal, when the Mamluks immediately offered him the same terms, and sent him all the surviving Christian prisoners, who were in their hands, not excepting even those whom the fear of death had compelled to renounce the Christian religion, with the skulls and bones of all who had died under their hands. We are told that even the Old Man of the Mountain, courted the friendship of Lewis on this occasion, and sent him presents, which were answered by others from Lewis, who at the same time ridiculously attempted to convert that prince. Those offers from Saracens and infidels, however, were less surprizing to the French nobility, than a message dispatched to Lewis from the German emperor, Frederic II. who though he affected to have no religion at all, and was a sworn enemy to popes, had interposed zealously with the Manluks for the deliverance of Lewis. This message did not indeed come till after Lewis had recovered his liberty; but it does great honour to the memory of Frederic. The war which still continued between the Mamluks and the sultan of Damascus, was of vast service to Lewis, who in the year 1251 was again at the head of no inconsiderable army. Early in the spring he removed from Acon, and rebuilt the walls of Cæsarea, and at last determined himself in favour of the Mamluks, against the sultan of Damascus.

Mamluks, and obliged to fly to Gadres, the ancient Gadara, in Palestine. A treaty was here set on foot between the sultan and the Mamluks, who were now unwilling to fulfil their terms which they had stipulated with Lewis, by putting him in possession of Palestine. An accommodation soon followed, by which Lewis was deserted by both, and left to the poor consolation of visiting religious walls and sanctified places; and here it is generally allowed that he was outwitted by the barbarians, who had chosen Azzoddin for their head. Naser, sultan of Damascus, in revenge for his having been abandoned by Lewis, attacked Acon, from which he was beaten with loss; and understanding that Lewis intended to rebuild Sidon and Belinas, the antient Cæsarea-Philippi, he attacked both places, but he was repulsed from both, though he had forced Lewis to shut himself in the castle of Sidon, and cut in pieces about two camp. The deliverance of Lewis on this occasion, though his troops had failed in an attempt they made upon the castle of Belines, was in a great measure owing to the courage and conduct of Oliver de Termes, a brave French officer under him.

His religious indolence and extravagance.

Every day now gave fresh proofs of the ravages which superstition and enthusiasm produce in the noblest nature. Lewis, instead of acting any thing at this time answerable to the great character he had acquired in arms, employed himself in making processions, attended by priests and monks, to the holy mountain at Tabor, and the sacred chamber at Nazareth; but he was sensibly mortified that his regal majesty did not permit his entering the city of Jerusalem, but as a conqueror. He arrived at last to such a pitch of religious infatuation, that he lent his royal shoulders as a common corps-bearer to the interment of the putrid bodies and bones of those who had died in their Egyptian captivity. To crown his madness, he laid out prodigious sums which he had been able to amass from the generosity of his subjects, and by his own œconomy, upon fortifying Sidon, Caiaphas, Acon, and other places on the sea-coast, though he could not but foresee that they must in time fall into the hands of the infidels.

His mother's death determines him to return to France.

Lewis, in 1254, was greatly affected with the news of the death of his mother, and that her days had been shortened by the grief she conceived for his misfortunes. He immediately resolved to return to France with part of his army, and to leave the remainder in Palestine, under the command of Geoffrey de Sergines, one of his most experienced officers, with a large sum of money in the hands of the legate, for the payment of the garrisons he left behind him in Palestine. On the twenty-third of April, he put himself, his wife, children, and attendants on board fourteen ships, but met prodigious dangers by sea; so that the queen made a vow, if she escaped, to offer a ship of silver to St. Nicholas of Lorraine, where it remains to this day.

Lewis having touched at Cyprus, landed at Yeres, and made his entry into Paris in the beginning of September. His subjects found a vast alteration in his looks, which were now thoughtful, severe and disconsolate. His dress was plain, and his attendants but few, excepting on days of state. He gave his daughter Isabel in marriage, after compromising all differences with regard to the county of Bretagne, to Theobald II. king of Navarre; and Henry III. of England, who was then in Gascony, expressed an earnest desire to have an interview with Lewis, to which the latter consented. Upon this occasion it was, that the dowager countess of Provence had the unusual happiness of meeting with her four daughters, the queens of England and France, and the countesses of Anjou and Cornwall.

The

The histories of those times are full of the splendor of the Where he interview between the two kings. Lewis met his illustrious is visited guest at some distance from Paris, and they entertained each by Henry other with the same freedom and friendship as if they had III. of been educated together. Henry was attended by a hundred England. horsemen, all of them nobly mounted. They were received at the gates of Paris by the scholars of the university, and the citizens, with a profusion of honours and splendid exhibitions; and Henry took up his lodging at the Old Temple, which was then large enough to accommodate all his train. Matthew Paris, who lived at the time, and seems to have been on the spot, has been very particular in describing the festivities which passed on this occasion. According to him, Lewis offered Henry the seat of honour, but Henry refused it. Next day, however, when Henry visited Lewis in his palace within Paris, the latter told Henry that he was master there, and would be obeyed, and he accordingly obliged Henry to take the seat of honour. It is said, that the expence of one day's entertainment cost Lewis a thousand pounds in silver, and that he bewailed the haughtiness of his French lords, who would not suffer him to do justice to Henry by restoring him Normandy.

Having renewed the truce with Henry, Lewis applied He re- himself to reform the abuses that had crept into his kingdom forms the during his absence, and above all, to settle disputes among internal his subjects. He was so intent upon this, that he gave state of money out of his own purse, to his brother Charles of Anjou, his king- to enable him to fulfil an award pronounced by himself, in dom. a difference between Charles and the old countess of Provence. He was equally anxious about terminating all differences, with his neighbours. He renewed his treaties and connections with the king of Arragon, whose daughter he intended his eldest son Lewis should marry; but upon the death of that prince, his second son Philip espoused her. This was about the year 1263, when the differences between Henry III. of England and his barons had risen to a great height; but so venerable was the character of Lewis at that time, that both parties agreed to make him the arbiter of their differences. The award of Lewis, though unexceptionable, was disagreeable to both parties, though each construed it in his own favour. Lewis, by condemning all that had been done at Oxford, and by the rebellious barons during the course of the civil war, restored Henry to his independency as a king; but at the same time he awarded him to observe all the stipulations of Magna Charta; which the barons pretended was all they had desired from the beginning.

king of Naples by Mainfroi's title, or whatever crimes he might have been guilty of, it is certain, that the French prince could have no manner of right to that succession, which undoubtedly belonged to the house of Suabia. Lewis, was either blinded by his deference to the papal power, or by the desire of aggrandizing his own family; when after long and serious deliberations, he not only agreed that his brother should accept the iniquitous offer, but resolved to assist him with all his power. Charles, at this time, was a powerful prince, being possessed of Provence, and Languedoc, a part of Piedmont, and many other noble estates; but neither he nor Lewis thought, that, without a vigorous assistance from the holy see, his power was equal to so great an undertaking.

Upon the death of pope Urban, the papal chair was filled by Clement IV. who clogged the terms which had been offered by his predecessor, with such restrictions in favour of the holy see, as damped the zeal of Lewis and his brother for concluding the bargain. Clement, however, by giving up some terms, and softening others, and by feeding the royal brothers with most magnificent promises, at last, brought them to embark heartily in the undertaking. The reader, in former parts of this work, has been made fully acquainted with the history of Charles of Anjou, of his having accepted the papal offer, of his having defeated Mainfroi on the plains of Benevento, of the barbarity with which he exercised his victory, and of his inhumanly putting to death Conradin of Suabia, and his cousin the arch-duke of Austria. To the reproach of Lewis, or rather of that corrupted Christianity which he called religion, and with which he was infatuated, we are informed of no opposition which he gave to the infernal cruelties of his brother, who from his successes in having seated himself on the throne of Naples, is by the French historians distinguished by the title of the founder of the first Anjouvine line.

While Lewis was thus employed in contributing to the exaltation of his family, his kingdom felt the benefit of many excellent regulations which he laid down for its internal welfare. The code of his laws is still known by the name of the establishment of St. Lewis. He formed that system of inland commerce, and the rules to be observed among mechanics, merchants, and manufacturers, that still takes place in France; and he put the demesnes of his crown upon a respectable, because a certain, foundation. By enforcing the feudal laws with regard to successions, he became heir to many noble families; and in all disputes between him and his great lords, they thought themselves happy if he constituted himself sole judge, because, where there was the least opening in favour of the subject, he decided against himself. This happened in the case of the county of Dammartin, which he separated from the crown of France,

France, to which it had been annexed, in favour of Matthew de Trie, who claimed to be heir to the counts of Boulogne. He gave up to Henry III. of England, the Limosin, Querci, Perigord, and other places, upon that prince and his son's renouncing all right to Normandy, Anjou, Maine, Touraine, and Poitou. This he did merely out of a scruple of conscience, as the crown of England was, at that time, in no condition to have reclaimed those countries.

Instead of following the common policy of fomenting differences among his neighbours, Lewis did all he could to reconcile them; as happened in a dispute concerning the town of Bayonne, between the kings of England and Naparré. In short, Lewis laid the foundations of his government on the most amiable of all principles, that of ruling less by his power than by his authority; by which is meant, the opinion which his subjects and neighbours conceived of his virtue.

But with all those sublime qualifications, Lewis, notwithstanding all that he and his subjects had suffered, never was thoroughly cured of his favourite phrensy, his passion for crusades. Ever since his return from the Holy Land he had been amassing money and materials for a new expedition, and he was resolved to begin by the reduction of Tunis, the king of which, he said, had deceived him, by not performing his promise in turning Christian. He had invited young Edward of England, the bravest and the wisest prince of his age, to attend him; and when Edward excused himself on account of the lowness of his father's finances through the civil wars, Lewis, according to Matthew Paris, immediately offered either to lend, or to give him freely thirty thousand marks, which Edward accepted of, and secured Lewis in the repayment, by a mortgage upon Guienne. He was, in like manner, solicitous to be attended by his brother the king of Naples, who promised to assist him in his expedition with all his force, notwithstanding the state of his yet unsettled kingdom. It is true, that the expedition was particularly convenient for Charles, as the Tunisians were extremely troublesome to his Neapolitan subjects; but Lewis had no great regard to that consideration, and sought only to secure a commodious post in the Mediterranean, for the conveniency of his expedition. Every thing concurred in dissuading Lewis from his undertaking. His brother Charles of Anjou, was more powerful than himself, and as he was to reap the chief benefit of the expedition, he ought to have carried it into execution. The kingdom of France was enjoying in tranquility the fruits of her king's patriot and mild administration. He had settled his children in life with proper provisions for each, and arts, agriculture, and manufactures, were making a surprizing progress in his kingdom.

Summary
of his history and character.

Those important considerations had no weight with Lewis, who engaged his three sons, and his nephew the count of Artois, to attend him. Accordingly, on the eleventh of July 1270, he embarked at Aigues Mortes, and steering for Africa, he seized upon what are thought to be the ruins of Carthage, and laid siege to Tunis. By this time, he had not been joined by his brother's armament, and the heats of the country and season had introduced into his army pestilential diseases, which swept off great numbers of his troops; and at last seized upon the king himself. Perceiving his end approaching, he spent the remaining moments of his life in instructing his eldest son Philip, in the duties of a king, and he died in the fifty-sixth year of his age, and the forty-fourth of his reign.

It appears from our history of this prince, that he was one of the most amiable that ever sat upon a throne. He was endued with all that is great, manly, and generous, in the human frame; but all those noble qualities were overcast by the pestilent turn of his religious notions, which hurried him into undertakings equally unjust as barbarous. His virtues were so much revered by his neighbours, that they proved to be the sources of his grandeur, as well as of his happiness. Before his time, the administration of justice was in the hands of the laymen, who sat in parliament, and every petty barony had its own judge, from whom there was no appeal. Lewis introduced into his parliament men of letters, who had studied the principles of distributive justice; and he opened four royal bailiwicks, where appeals might be brought for relief of the subject against the arbitrary or ignorant decrees of inferior courts.

It is likewise to the glory of Lewis, that notwithstanding his profound submission to the papal see, he checked its encroachments upon his temporal power, and he was the author of that pragmatic which secures the liberties of the Gallican church, and which we shall often have occasion to mention, and explain. He added to his crown Namur, Peronne, Auranches, Mortagne, and du Perche; but his moderation and justice prevented his taking advantage of the troubles of England, by enlarging his dominions with that prince's dominions in France.

A slight review of the situation of Lewis can easily account for the harmony that always subsisted between him and the Roman pontiffs, notwithstanding his checking their encroachments; for Lewis lived at a time when a perpetual and most cruel war was carried on between the popes and the emperors of Germany. Lewis, without breaking with either, obtained the esteem and friendship of both; and Clement XI. granted him the tenth penny on the revenues of his clergy for three years. The last expedition of Lewis was plainly a trap laid for his devotion, by his brother,
Charles

Charles of Anjou, who pretended, that the king of Tunis ought to be his tributary, and that he was greatly in his arrears.

Those crusades enriched the then maritime powers of Europe, who were the Pisans, the Genoese, and the Venetians, but impoverished France, England, Germany, and other countries, both in men and money. By a strange revolution, this impoverishment contributed to the aggrandizement of the French crown. When kings served in person, their principal subjects vied with each other in the splendor, richness, and number of their equipages, and either before or after the expedition, they generally found themselves under a necessity of selling or mortgaging part of their estates to defray their expences. The excellent plan which Lewis had laid down for the increase of his finances, had enabled him, during the last thirteen years of his residence in France, to purchase many of those estates, and the improvement of manufactures and agriculture among the lower ranks of the French had been such, that many of the townships or boroughs, were rich enough to buy their franchises from their respective lords; which, remotely, was likewise an acquisition to the crown, not only as those purchases weakened its overgrown subjects, but because the purchasers naturally put themselves under its protection for the validity of their bargains.

Lewis IX. commonly called St. Lewis, by his queen Margaret, daughter of Raimond Berengar, count of Provence, had six sons, and five daughters; Lewis the eldest, died when he was but sixteen years of age. The second, Philip, succeeded to the throne of France; John, the third son, died a child; John Tristram, the fourth, was born at Damiata, while his father was a prisoner in Egypt, and died at the siege of Tunis; Peter, the fifth son, was count of Alençon, and married the countess of Blois; Robert, the sixth son, was count of Clermont, and married the heiress of the house of Bourbon. The eldest daughter, Blanche, died young; Isabel, the second daughter, was wife to Theobald king of Navarre, and had no issue; Blanche was born in Syria, and wife of the royal infant, Ferdinand de la Cerda; Margaret, the fourth daughter, married John duke of Brabant; and Agnes, the youngest, was wife to Robert II. duke of Burgundy. As to queen Margaret herself, she was not only one of the greatest beauties, but one of the wisest women of her age. Though she declined all connections with state affairs, yet she was often chosen arbiter in territorial and other disputes between the greatest princes. She died at the age of seventy-six, in the year 1285, having spent the last twelve years of her life in retirement. Lewis IX. was canonized in 1297, by Boniface VIII.

Philip III. commonly called the Hardy.

The crusade
fatal to the royal family of France.

NOtwithstanding the great interest the king of Naples had in the success of his brother's expedition against Tunis, yet he had not, at the time of Lewis's death, joined it, either with his ships or troops, but he did in a few days after. The French army was then in a miserable condition; the pestilence continued to rage in their camp, and it was beset by great numbers of Moors and Saracens. Philip, the eldest surviving son of St. Lewis, immediately upon his father's decease took upon himself the regal state, and behaved with so much firmness against the Moors, that he then obtained the surname of the Hardy. Being seized with the pestilential disorder, he was obliged to commit the care of his army to the kings of Naples and Navarre. Charles of Anjou, is, not without great justice, accused of having, during the whole of this unfortunate campaign, held a private correspondence with the Tunisian prince, or king, whom he brought over to his terms, upon Charles engaging to withdraw his own and the French troops from Tunis, which they were preparing to besiege.

The state of affairs in France, where the abbot of St. Dennis, and the count of Nesle, by the appointment of the late king, acted as regents, rendered a peace necessary, and it was concluded upon advantageous terms for Charles, who was to receive double tribute, and a large sum of ready money, a small part of which was to be paid to his nephew the king of France. Upon the conclusion of this treaty, an end was put to the expedition, which was particularly fatal to the royal family of France, by the death of the king, and one of his sons, the king and queen of Navarre; Isabel of Arragon, and the count and countess of Poitiers, who all of them died of diseases contracted in the expedition. Philip, to divert his melancholly, visited Italy in his way to Paris, where he was received with that affection for which the French had been always remarkable to their kings.

Philip
of Foix.

Philip found that the feudal system continued to operate strongly, notwithstanding all the wise precautions taken by his father to correct it. After his coronation, he found that the royal domain which, as we have already hinted, was the sole source of the royal revenues of France, was in excellent order and tranquility, but that a kind of civil war was carrying on between the count of Armagnac and the lord of Casaubon. At first, the lord of Casaubon was victorious, by beating the count and killing his brother, when they insulted him in his castle. The count, however, being related to some of the most considerable families of the kingdom, summoned together so great a force, that the lord of Casaubon implored the royal protection, and in the mean while, surrendered himself prisoner to the king, who was, at that time, on his journey to take possession of the county of Tholouse. Philip ordered him and his family to reside at the castle of Sompui, which lay within the royal domain. The count of Foix, one of the count of Armagnac's allies, without regarding the royal protection, invested Sompui, and took all within it prisoners, the lord of Casaubon excepted. Philip resented this affront put upon his royal authority, ordered three summonses to be issued for the count of Foix to appear before him, and these being disregarded, he besieged the strong castle of Foix, and reduced the count to such extremity, that he was obliged to throw himself at the feet of the king, who sent him in irons a prisoner to Paris. At the same time, all the estates and effects of the count were forfeited to the crown. Philip, however, by his severity towards the count, meant, only to vindicate his royal authority. He treated the count's family with great tenderness, and after keeping him a prisoner for twelve months, he restored him, with admonitions for his good behaviour, to all his possessions.

The crown of Navarre, at this time, belonged to the He mar- only daughter of its late king, Henry, by the daughter of ries his Robert, count of Artois, brother to St. Lewis. That son to the princess therefore, naturally becoming a ward to the king heiress of of France, he solicited at Rome a dispensation for leave (on Navarre. account of the consanguinity) to marry her to his eldest son Philip. The match was opposed by the courts of Castile and Arragon, as tending to the too great aggrandizement of the French royal family. Philip, to engage the pope, who was Gregory X. in his favour, made him a present of the county of Venaissin; but Gregory, who was privately jealous of the French greatness, refused to grant the dispensation to Philip's eldest son; but gave it to Lewis his second son; upon which Philip took possession of the kingdom of Navarre in right of his son. About the same time, (having lost his first wife Isabel, of Arragon, and her eldest son, by whose death, Philip became heir apparent of the French crown) he married the beautiful Mary, daughter to the duke of Brabant; and so great was his love for peace, that when Edward I. of England, performed homage to him for his French possessions, he gave him the county of Aginois, which Edward claimed by virtue of a compromise between their two fathers.

The favourite of Philip, was one Peter de la Brosse, who His fa- from being barber to St. Lewis, engrossed the confidence vourite and abused the power of the son. This worthless minister la Brosse had even the impudence to be jealous of the young queen's hanged. ascendancy over her husband, and privately spread a report of her having effected the death of prince Lewis by poison. The princes of those days were, in their private capacities, most despicably credulous. Few of them were without their their astrologer, who pretended to divine future events ; or some professor of supernaturalism. La Brosse had inspired his master with confidence in a nun, who, he said, had the faculty of divination ; and Philip was weak enough to send the bishop of Eureaux, a relation and friend of la Brosse, to consult the nun about having poisoned prince Lewis. The bishop brought back a report unfavourable for the queen ; and the king employed other agents, to whom the nun declared the queen to be innocent. This disgraced la Brosse with the king, and the family of Brabant had credit enough to procure his being put to death, without any formal trial, they themselves being witnesses of his execution. This act of severity was construed by the people, who execrated la Brosse in his life, as being bloody and arbitrary. Philip was then embroiled with the count of Castile, on account of his two nephews, the infants de la Cerda, who had been set aside from the succession to that crown by their uncle don Sancho. This dispute occasioned an insurrection in Navarre, which was suppressed ; but two untowardly events now broke into Philip's private, as well as public, tranquility. The charge against his queen for having poisoned his eldest son, was pushed with so much vigour, that the determination was left, according to the barbarous custom of those times, to the decision of champions. He who fought for the queen, had been singled out by her eldest son. Her brother, the duke of Brabant, as being the most expert of any in France in the exercise of arms, and he accordingly proved victorious ; upon which his antagonist was executed upon a gibbet. The other event was still more alarming, and was no other than the famous Sicilian Vespers (which we have more than once taken notice of) when about eight thousand French were massacred in Sicily in 1282, occasioned by their own insolence, and the barbarous tyranny of Charles of Anjou, king of Sicily. Charles had so dazzled the eyes of the French by his successful usurpation, that they adored him, and though his Italian and Sicilian subjects revolted from him in favour of don Pedro, king of Arragon, who had married the daughter of Mainfroi the bastard, killed in a battle by Charles, the nobility petitioned the king for leave to assist him, and Philip granted their request. The event may be seen in former parts of this history, particularly in that of Italy.

See Vol. X. p. 112. Philip makes an expedition into Spain.

As Charles had generally been a favourite with the Roman pontiffs, the thunder of the vatican fell upon the king of Arragon, who was excommunicated by pope Martin. The same sentence gave Arragon to any of Philip's sons whom he should please to nominate ; and he was infatuated enough, not only to equip an immense fleet for the assistance of his uncle, Charles, but to march with an army into the kingdom of Arragon, with a design of placing his son, Charles of Valois, upon that throne. He penetrated as far as Gironne, in Catalonia,

Catalonia, which he compelled to surrender; but his fleet being destroyed by the Arragonefe admiral, and his army thereby losing all the means of subsistence, Philip was obliged to retreat to Perpignon; where he died of grief, in the sixteenth year of his reign, and the forty-first of his age. where he dies.

His subjects had given him the name of Hardy, before they had any knowledge of his real disposition, which inclined to peace, till his uncle's misfortunes, and the papal promises, hurried him into the war that cost him his life. It is to his honour that he endeavoured to revive the noble notions of the Franks, who looked upon themselves to be equally noble, and that there ought to be among them no distinction of birth or quality, but what was earned by superior merit. It was upon this principle that Philip granted letters of nobility to one Ralph, the goldsmith; and he annexed the county of Poitiers to his crown upon the death of its count, Alonso, notwithstanding the opposition made by the king of Sicily, who pretended to a prior right. The parliament of Paris, however, gave a formal decision in favour of Philip the Hardy, in 1283, and which is still extant. If Philip did not possess all the high qualities of his father, St. Lewis, yet he did not disgrace him as a successor; and he followed his steps in those pacific measures that contributed to the greatness and riches of France.

Philip the Hardy's first wife was donna Isabella, daughter to the king of Arragon. She died in 1271, after bearing him four sons: Lewis, who, as we have already seen, was thought to have been poisoned by his mother-in-law; Philip, called the Handsome, who succeeded to the crown; Charles, count of Valois; and Robert, who died an infant. By Mary of Brabant, his second wife, he had Lewis, count of Evreux; Margaret, who married Edward I. king of England, in 1299; and Blanche; who was married, first, to the count of Hainault; and afterwards to the emperor Rodolph's son. Mary of Brabant lived thirty-six years after her husband, and died in the year 1321. His wives and issue.

Philip IV. surnamed the Handsome.

WE have already mentioned the marriage of this prince with the heiress of Navarre, by whom he likewise acquired the counties of Champagne and Barre. At his accession to the throne, he found himself involved in an impolitic and unprosperous war with the kings of Castile and Arragon; but he compromised matters with Edward I. of England, the greatest prince of his time, to whom he gave up Xantoigne; for which Edward performed him homage at Paris. Charles the lame, eldest son to Charles of Anjou, was, at this time, a prisoner to the king of Arragon. A great friendship subsisting between Charles the lame and Edward of England, Accession of Philip IV.

land, the latter, after performing his homage, went to Bordeaux; where he held a parliament of his vassals; gave audience to the ambassadors of Castile, Aragon, and Sicily, and set on foot a negotiation for the deliverance of Charles the lame.

The generous intentions of Edward were defeated by the turbulence of the pope, who refused to ratify the treaty concluded between Edward and the king of Aragon; by which don James, that king's brother, was to enjoy the crown of Sicily.

114.

We have already seen the terms on which Charles, at last, obtained his liberty; but, though king Edward paid twenty thousand of the fifty thousand livres stipulated for his ransom, he was both unwilling and unable to fulfil them; and he pressed Philip to continue the war against the king of Aragon in favour of his brother Charles of Valois, the pope's claimant of that crown. Edward, of England, thought himself ill used by this behaviour of Charles the lame, who pretended that he was forced upon what he did.

Charles the lame absolved from his engagements by the pope.

Pope Nicholas absolved him from his agreement with the king of Aragon; crowned him king of the Two Sicilies; and sent an army of crusaders, under a cardinal-legate, to Gaeta, against his competitor, don James, king of Sicily. Edward, of England, took those proceedings so much amiss, that he accused the pope of being the firebrand of Europe, and compelled him, at last, to agree to a truce he had concluded between Charles and James. To satisfy the count of Valois for his claim upon Aragon, which was the great bone of contention between the French and the Spaniards, Charles the lame gave him his daughter in marriage, together with the counties of Anjou and Maine in dowry; and Philip made peace with the king of Castile, by relinquishing the rights of his kinsmen, the infants de la Cerda. Those arrangements were approved of by all parties; but the count of Artois, who commanded a body of French in the service of Charles the lame, and who being disappointed in his towering expectations, returned in disgust to France.

War between France and England.

The great possessions which Edward I. of England had in France, did not fail of being attended with their usual consequences of embroiling the two kings. Philip valued himself on being lord-paramount of Edward's French possessions, and made no allowance for the superior abilities and power of Edward. The Gascons and the Normans, the former the subjects of Edward, the latter of Philip, quarrelled at sea; and the English taking part with the Gascons, a maritime war was, for some time, carried on, till Edward found himself obliged to order reprisals to be made. Philip's ambassadors demanded satisfaction at London, in very harsh terms; and Edward, who was passionately bent upon the conquest of Scotland and Wales, sent his brother Edmund to Paris, to apologize for what had happened. Philip knew so little of Edward's character, that he interpreted this condescension to be a mark of fear; summoned Edward to appear before his parliament at Paris; and, upon his non-appearance, he was adjudged to be guilty of felony, and all his French estates were forfeited to Philip. Edward bore this injustice with wonderful moderation; and the queen-consort and queen-mother of France undertook to mediate between the two monarchs. They proposed, that Philip, as a satisfaction to his honour for Edward's refusing to appear before the French parliament, should suffer Philip to name an officer who was to preside in all the great towns in Guienne, excepting three; and, that six of the principal fortresses of that province should be actually ceded to Philip. But it was proposed, at the same time, that, after Edward's sentence of forfeiture was taken off, the two kings should have an interview with each other for coming to a final accommodation; and, that, Philip's honour being thus satisfied, the ceded places should be restored to Edward. Prince Edmund, who was likewise earl of Lancaster, previous to his proceeding in the negotiation, obtained, in presence of the two queens, and some of the great lords both of France and England, a solemn declaration, that he would adhere to what had been proposed by the two queens; and, upon Edmund's producing his brother's ratification of the truce, John de St. John, Edward's general in Guienne, sold off his magazines; and the stipulated places were accordingly yielded up to the French troops.

The treaty was no sooner thus carried into execution, Philip's than Philip disavowed the promise he had made of restitution; and gave the constable of France orders to secure, for faith. his crown, the places that had been ceded. This naturally brought on a war between the two crowns; and Edward was so much exasperated, that he not only refused to stand by the late treaty, but disowned all allegiance and subjection to Philip as a vassal. The count of Valois, upon this, entered Guienne with an army, while Matthew de Montmorenci and John de Harcourt invaded England and burnt Dover, with some other places upon the sea-coast. To counterbalance those operations, Edward's general, John de St. John took the town of Bayonne, and the English fleet ravaged the coasts of Normandy; where it destroyed Cherbourg and several other places.

In 1296, Edmund, earl of Lancaster, who was sent over by Vol. IX. his brother to command in Guienne, died at Bayonne; but p. 8. Edward, being still intent on the conquest of Scotland, made an alliance with the emperor Adolph of Nassau; and the counts of Bretagne, Holland, Bar, Fuliers, Gueldres, and Flanders. Adolph having received a considerable sum from Edward, formally demanded, that Philip should resign to him the kingdom of Arles, and the other fiefs which he held of the empire. This being refused, a war commenced be-

Charles the lame, who was now king of Naples, interposed, in gratitude for the obligations he was under to Edward ; and a truce was concluded for two years, till a definitive treaty could be settled under the pope's mediation. Next year, the county of Bretagne was erected into a dutchy and peerage of France, to replace the dutchy and peerage of Champagne, which was now unalienably annexed to the crown. Bretagne was then held by John de Dreux, who was of the blood royal of France, and had married the sister of Edward, king of England.

Vol. X. We have already related the rise of the dispute between
p. 121. Philip and Boniface VIII. who was one of the most haughty pontiffs that had ever filled that chair ; and we shall here supply what the nature of our work required we should omit in the history of Italy.

Philip at Philip, in his disposition, was as haughty and arbitrary as variance Boniface ; and disregarded all the pope's exhortations for a with pope crusade to recover Ptolemais, which the Christians had just Boniface, lost. Philip had raised money upon his clergy, and the pope had forbidden them, under pain of excommunication, to furnish him with more. Boniface had invited Charles of Valois, Philip's brother, to Italy, where he had made him his vicar in Tuscany ; and, after marrying the grand-daughter of Baldwin II. emperor of Constantinople, he declared him emperor of the East. Those honours, thus heaped upon Charles of Valois, did not abate the differences between Philip and Boniface ; but the papal power was then so terrible, that both Edward and Philip consented to submit the determination of their disputes to the pontiff's arbitration. He accordingly awarded, that all Philip's conquests in Guienne should be restored to Edward ; that his holiness should be the depository of the places still in dispute, and have the direction in all restitutions and other matters preparative to a definitive treaty.

While this treaty was in dependance, Boniface and Philip again quarrelled. The pope demanded, that Philip should account for the money which the see of Rome had allowed him to raise, by a tenth penny, for the assistance of the Holy Land ; and which Philip had applied to the carrying on of his wars against the king of England. It is almost incredible that, though Boniface VIII. had afresh decreed, that no person in holy orders was to pay any thing to the king his master, without the express commission of the sovereign pontiff, Philip durst shew no other resentment than by issuing an ordinance for a general prohibition of carrying the coin out of France. Boniface had erected the abbey of Pamieres into a bishopric, in favour of one Bernard Sayseti, a factious ecclesiastic, whom Philip hated; while Philip patronized the noble family of Colonna at Rome, who disowned the pope's authority.

The repressing the pontifical insolence was now the common cause both of Philip and Edward, and occasioned their accommodating all differences, by a definitive treaty concluded on the twentieth of May, 1303. This treaty included an article, by which the two kings respectively agreed to defend each other's prerogatives against all attacks; and that stipulation was supposed to be aimed at the pope, who had sent the turbulent bishop of Pamieres, as his legate, into France.

Philip's resentment of this usage seemed to encrease the whole le-pope's insolence. He published bulls upon bulls, declaring, gate he over the kings and kingdoms of the earth." The bishop of Pamieres, though a subject of the king, braved him to his face; for which he was put under an arrest. Philip, instead of putting the legate to death, sent his chancellor, Peter Flotta, to plead his cause; first, before the archbishop of Narbonne, at Senlis, against the bishop of Pamieres; and then before the pope in person, at Rome, to justify his having put the bishop under arrest.

Flotta executed his commission with great intrepidity. He told Boniface, That the kingdom of France was of this world, but that of the pope was not. The pope answered this freedom by repeating his insolent bulls, summoning the French bishops to appear before him at Rome, and threatening Philip with excommunication if he did not immediately set his legate at liberty. Those bulls and menaces were presented to Philip by another of his subjects, who was archdeacon of Narbonne, and who had been nominated by Boniface to be his nuntio at the court of France.

Philip ordered the bulls to be thrown into the fire, but Disowns dismissed the nuntio. The breach now seemed to be in- th- pope's curable, and Philip at last, being excommunicated by the authority pope, denied the validity of his election. Forty French in tem- bishops, though forbidden by their king in the most porals. peremptory manner to leave France, repaired to Rome; and a general disposition appeared among them and the German prelates for admitting the pope's claim of judging all princes in temporals as well as spirituals. Boniface having written a letter in that insolent strain to Philip, the latter answered him in the following words. "To Boniface, the pretend-

“supreme vanity, that we are in subjection to no one in temporal matters.” The clergy of France were divided, and the king in 1303 assembled his states, including such of his clergy, as remained faithful to his prerogative. The question agitated in the meeting was in fact neither more nor less than whether Boniface or Philip was king of France. The members stood by Philip, and were seconded by the magistrates and representatives of cities, a third order which was now introduced into the French assemblies of the states. Notwithstanding all this, neither Philip nor any of his subjects had the courage or sense to strike at the root of the evil they complained of, by disowning the pope’s authority in spiritual, as well as in temporal, matters. Instead of that, after suffering excommunication they appealed to a general council under a future pope, and they put the whole question between them on the single point of the pope’s personal abuse of power and the validity of his election, which last head was uncontested by any of the other European powers.

French.

A regular war was now entered into by Philip and Boniface as temporal princes. Philip had recalled his brother Charles of Anjou from Italy, but that prince had left some French troops in Tuscany, to whom his holiness was in arrears, and who were very ready to embrace any proposal that could procure them their money, or humble the pontiff. Philip had hitherto preserved his subjects in their allegiance; but he was startled when he heard that the pope had a bull prepared for giving his monarchy to the emperor, and for absolving all Frenchmen from their allegiance to him as their sovereign. According to the best authors, this bull was actually published when Philip resolved to strike a decisive blow, by employing William de Nogaret, and Sciarra Colonna, to collect a body of French troops, who surprised the pontiff at Anagni, the place of his residence.

His death.

We have already seen the noble deportment of his holiness, when he was made prisoner, and that he died of chagrin soon after. Upon the whole, Philip’s seasonable opposition to the pope, was a severe blow to the person of Boniface; but was of no prejudice to the pontifical authority. It is even doubtful from the complexion of the history, both civil and ecclesiastical, of that time, whether if Philip had not in a formal process proved Boniface to have been guilty of murdering his predecessor, after persuading him to resign the pontificate, of procuring himself to be elected by indirect means, and using many blasphemous expressions, by denying the whole of the Christian religion; whether the loyalty of the French would have been proof against the papal fulminations. Philip gave a proof how tender he was of the rights of an unexceptionable pope. He suffered Nogaret, who had done him so important a service, and who is said to have saved the pope’s life, by rescuing him from from the fury of Colonna, to appear as a criminal before the next pope, Benedict XI. who condemned him to perpetual exile in the Holy Land.

Benedict XI. was of a more practicable temper than pope Boniface VIII. had been. Among many other reformations by Benedict XI. of church discipline and papal abuses of power, he took off all the interdicts that had been laid upon Philip or his kingdom, by his predecessor. He restored the former harmony that had subsisted between France and the see of Rome, and he pardoned the Colonnas; but it was thought that he was poisoned on account of his zeal for reformation. The choice of the next pope was a matter of great delicacy. Philip's party in the conclave gave him intelligence that the cardinals were inclinable to elect the archbishop of Bordeaux, who was known to be no favourer of the principles on which Philip had proceeded against Boniface. Philip ordered the archbishop to meet him in a wood, where he actually offered him the papal dignity, on his promise to suffer the process against Boniface to be closed, to condemn his memory, to renounce his acts, to give him the tenths of the French clergy for five years, to restore the Colonnas to their estates, and to grant him another demand which he did not think then proper to reveal. Upon the archbishop promising faithfully to perform all those particulars, Philip gave way to his being elected pope, and he took the name of Clement V. As an earnest of his good faith towards his benefactor, he insisted upon being crowned at Lyons, which he accordingly was on the fourteenth of November 1305. After his coronation, returning from church on horseback, attended by the king and the princes of the blood, who by turns held the bridle, a wall overloaded by his corospectators fell among the illustrious processionists, beat off the pope's crown, wounded the king and the count of Valois, and crushed to death the duke of Bretagne, the pope's brother, and several other persons of eminence.

Philip now called upon the pope for the performance of his promises, especially that of condemning the memory of Boniface. Clement considered this matter in a very different light from what he had done before. He saw, that should he stigmatise the memory of a pope, and reverse his acts, he must aim an irrecoverable blow at the whole system of the papal infallibility. He did not however flatly refuse to gratify Philip, but he prudently threw in such delays on pretence of being willing to receive further information, that the process came to nothing, and the memory of Boniface in the sequel, instead of being stigmatized, was justified. Philip, though impatient and haughty, saw into Clement's motives, but his resentment subsiding, and the pope's friendship being necessary to the great purposes he had in view, he was forced to acquiesce. He had persuaded Clement by this time, to change the place of the papal residence from Rome to Avignon, but tho' he, in a manner, now lived under the protection of Philip, he was by no means so devoted to his interest as that prince had expected.

Compro- Philip had with great industry strengthened himself with mise be- alliances, by which, with the pope's assistance, he was in tween hopes to compass the great matters he had in view. His son Philip and Lewis, was king of Navarre in his mother's right, and his
the future daughter Isabel, the most abandoned woman of her age, pope. had been married to Edward II. of England, who was in perfect friendship with his father-in-law, and had done him homage for Guienne. The death of the emperor, Albert, who was murdered by his nephew John, the young duke of Suabia, opened a career for Philip's ambition; and he now laid before Clement the secret desire of his soul, which at their first interview he told him he would reserve for a proper opportunity. This was no other than to procure either himself or Charles of Valois, his brother, to be elected emperor of Germany. Clement was startled at the proposal. He trembled at the thoughts of seeing the royal family of France so powerful, and he privately dispatched an express to the electors, informing them that if they did not immediately proceed to the choice of an emperor, they must receive Philip or his brother for their head. At the same time, he recommended to them Henry, count of Luxembourg, who was accordingly chosen. Philip was upon his march to Avignon with a body of troops to make good his pretensions to the empire, when he received the news of his disappointment; nor does it appear that he was then acquainted with the true motive of the election.

It cannot, however, be denied, that Clement's friendship was of vast service to Philip. He persuaded the archbishop of Lyons to renounce the temporal sovereignty of that city, which was for ever annexed to the crown of France; but the extinction of the order of Knights Templars, is the transaction that chiefly distinguishes the reign of Philip the Handsome.

Extermi- The vast schemes of Philip's ambition, especially in his nation Flemish wars, which we shall recount hereafter; had laid of the his government under great distresses for money, and he Knights had been obliged to make several alterations in his coin that Templars. had been vastly prejudicial to the creditors of his crown, the chief of whom were the Knights Templars. That order of men, by acting in the double capacity of monks and soldiers, had in the former capacity amassed vast wealth by pious donations, which had been made them through the credulity of the age, and in the latter, by their swords.
Their institution undoubtedly was impolitic and dangerous to civil government, because in matters of obedience they owned no immediate superior but the pope, and their grand master, and they industriously affected to keep secret the

institutions and rules of their order. Their immense property made them the bankers of Europe, and Philip's finances were in their hands, when an insurrection happened at Paris, occasioned by the alterations of the coin, which Philip suspected the Knights Templars to have fomented. Whatever may be in this, it is certain, that Philip had formed a deep plan for their extirpation, which he pursued with great steadiness till he accomplished it. The insolence, pride, luxury, and dissolute manners of the knights assisted him in his design, one Squin de Florian, a burgher of Beziers, who was himself a knight of the order, had been sentenced by the great master, to perpetual imprisonment, as was another, Noffo de Florentin, for a variety of crimes he had committed. Those two wretches pretended, that if they were brought before the king they could make great discoveries to the disgrace of the order.

It is more than probable, that those two apostates had been privately encouraged by the king in what they offered; because, before that time, he certainly had resolved upon the extinction of that order, and had treated with the pope, and other princes for that purpose. The apostate knights were indulged in their demand, and being admitted to the king's presence, their discoveries, whether real or pretended, were truly horrible and infernal. They accused their brethren of renouncing Jesus Christ on their entering into the order, and of devoting themselves to the devil, after performing certain ceremonies too detestable to be mentioned. Their examinations were kept secret. Philip had previously concerted with the pope, that the latter should call the chief knights of the order to France to take measures for a new crusade. Still pursuing his plan of secrecy he sent sealed orders to his bailiffs and other officers of justice, which under pain of death they were not to open till the thirteenth of October; but in the mean while, they were to call in assistance to enable them to execute an important piece of justice. Each magistrate opening his order on the appointed day, all of them terminated in the same purpose, that of immediately imprisoning the Knights Templars, and confiscating their effects and estates for the king's use, till they could be properly disposed of. This general order, through Philip's wise precaution, was punctually executed through all parts of France on the same day, while Clement came to Poitiers, that he might be at hand to assist at the trials.

Some difficulties occurred at first concerning the sole right which the pope had to try the members of a religious order, and that of the king to try his own subjects; but mutual interests soon terminated those disputes, and the process went forward. Clement examined seventy-two knights in person, and the trials of the remainder were committed to inquisitors, and commissaries. The allegations, it is true, were proved by the confession of great numbers of the order, but then we are to remember, that those confessions were forced from the unhappy knights, either by the application or the fear of the most exquisite tortures, which some of them were intrepid enough to undergo, and to die, affirming their innocence to the last. This circumstance is sufficient to induce us to suspect that the chief crimes of the Knights Templars consisted in their riches, and the intemperate use they made of them.

Confiderations on the same.

To believe that an order which subsisted by the religion of Jesus Christ, should abjure that religion, is to suppose the knights of the order to be void of common sense, as well as christianity. The other allegations are absurd, because they are unnatural, especially those of their worshipping a golden head, and of spitting upon the cross, crimes that could not contribute to the gratification of even vicious pleasures. At the same time, it is scarcely to be doubted, that some of the young knights had been not a little free in ridiculing the fopperies of the popish religion, which were then multiplied to a monstrous extravagance; and it must likewise be acknowledged, that the luxury, especially drunkenness of the order, was become proverbial. But the persecution of the unhappy knights was not confined to France; for in imitation of Philip, the kings of England and Spain, and other princes confiscated their revenues, but without putting their persons to death. Fifty-nine of them were burnt at Paris, and asserted their innocence to the last. To give the finishing blow to the order, Clement indicted a general council, at Vienne in Dauphiny, where the memory of pope Boniface was formally cleared from all imputation of heresy, simony, and other crimes, and two Catalan knights entered the lists to fight any two of Philip's subjects who should asperse it. A prince of Philip's haughty impetuous disposition, would not have borne such an insult upon his former conduct, had it not been to gratify his favourite view, we mean that of exterminating the order of the Knights Templars.

The cruel punishment and execution of the grand master.

The grand master of the order, Jean de Molay, and Guy, brother to the dauphin of Auvergne, two of the greatest lords in Europe, were not put to death because it was alledged, they had made confessions, which they were to read and acknowledge before all the people of Paris, and certain cardinals, and other persons of distinction, after which, they were to suffer perpetual imprisonment. The criminals accordingly appeared upon a scaffold erected before the church of Notre Dame, at Paris. Their confessions were read, but the grand master with a loud voice contradicted all that they contained, excepting an acknowledgment of the common frailties of nature, and said, if he or his brethren had confessed any thing else, they had done it thro' the dread of torture, with which they were menaced. He even said, that as he could neither read nor write, the commissaries commissaries had set down things in writing, the reverse of what he had acknowledged. This unexpected declaration from a man, who, (in other respects) seemed to be fond of life, wounded the credit of the king and the pope so much, that orders were given for immediately burning to death the grand master, and Guy de Auvergne, at a slow fire, a punishment which they magnanimously suffered, and they died asserting their innocence, and again appealing to heaven to judge between them and their persecutors. Seventy four of the order who were unimpeached, petitioned the council for leave to defend the innocence of their order; but their petition was rejected, to the disgrace of public justice, and the pope issued his bulls for abolishing the order over all christendom. Their estates in general were conferred on the knights of Rhodes, now the knights of Malta. In Germany, and Arragon, the knights made a noble resistance; but they were at last subdued, and the kings of Castile, and Arragon, gave that part of the spoil, which they did not appropriate to themselves, to the knights of Calatrava.

Though history is not particular as to the profit accruing to his holiness by the extinction of this order, yet we may easily conclude it to have been very considerable; and their Philip, notwithstanding the appropriation of their estates, seized them to the value of two hundred thousand livres, and his son Lewis, raised upon them sixty thousand more. The possessions which fell to the knights of Rhodes, were in no degree equal to those forfeited by the Templars, so that it seems credible, that great part of their wealth and estates fell to the share of private persons; nor was this great affair terminated till the year 1312.

The reannexing the county of Flanders to his crown was Philip another capital object with Philip; but he was not so successful in that as he was in persecuting the order of the Templars. He had treated that count, Guy de Dampier, in the same manner as his son-in-law the king of England had done the family of Bruce in Scotland, by not admitting him to be comprehended in any of their treaties. The Flemings, excepting, perhaps, the Venetians, were then the most flourishing people in Europe; but they were factious and divided. Some of them declaring for a French government, Philip sent his brother Charles of Valois, to support them, which he did so effectually, that old Guy and his sons surrendered themselves to Philip's mercy, upon his brother's engaging that they should not be confined, and that if in twelve months they did not effect an accommodation with Philip they should be at liberty to return. Notwithstanding this, they were obliged to attend the triumphal entry of Charles into Paris; and Philip disavowed the agreement made with Charles, and sent the old count prisoner to Compiègne, and his sons to other prisons. He is said to have been guilty of this this injustice, (though he stood in need of no prompter to gratify his lust of power) by the instigation of his queen and the count of Artois, who mortally hated Guy and his family, and Philip now openly declared his intention of reuniting Flanders to his crown.

The Flemings expelled his governor Chatillon, With this view, he and his queen made a most magnificent progress into Flanders, where they endeavoured to amuse the Flemings with the most pompous exhibitions of their grandeur; and to render themselves popular by abolishing some oppressive taxes. They could not, however, have pitched upon a more disagreeable person than John de Chatillon was, for the government of that country, to which he was appointed by the queen's interest. He fortified the towns of his government, and he countenanced the magistrates in oppressing the people, who were remarkably tenacious of their privileges; so that the whole country was soon filled with discontent. The people of Bruges, were headed by a dyer in opposing the French government; but he and his associates were soon driven out of the city, which Chatillon entered at the head of seventeen hundred French horse; preceded by two hogheads full of halters, which Chatillon publicly declared were to be employed in hanging the chiefs of the rebellious. Dispositions were made accordingly, but the people ran to arms, and recalling the dyer, cut in pieces fifteen hundred of the French horse, who were to have guarded the executions, Chatillon himself escaping with great difficulty by swimming across the town-ditch in the night-time. A general revolt of the country followed, and it was headed by three sons of the count, who had resided at Namur, their mother's inheritance, and who besieged Courtray.

and throw off the French yoke. This sudden revolt of a country on which Philip had set his heart, gave him great disquiet, and he made the count of Artois his general for reducing the Flemings, and raising the siege of Courtray. The count advanced to that city, and the princes, though their men were raw and undisciplined, fortified their camp and continued the siege at the same time; upon which the count of Artois, against the advice of the constable de Nesle, who attended him, prepared to attack their trenches with his cavalry. This rash attempt was punished by a total defeat of the French, twenty thousand of whom fell upon the spot, together with the count and the constable. This great defeat put almost all the noble families in France into mourning, and Philip raised the whole force of his kingdom to revenge it, but he was diverted, as is said, by a secret piece of intelligence, which his sister, the queen of England sent him, and which she pretended to have had from her husband, as if some of Philip's chief officers had entered into a conspiracy to deliver him into the hands of the Flemings. Whatever may be in this story, it is certain, that Philip pretended the season season was too far gone, and he put off his expedition to the next year.

In the mean while, the Genoese gallies which were in the A treaty. French pay, and commanded by Grimaldi, beat the Flemish fleet, commanded by the count's son Guy, who was taken and sent prisoner to Paris. This advantage did not compensate for the prodigious expence that attended the war. Philip, to defray it, had consented to the diminution of his coin, which we have already taken notice of; but all methods being found ineffectual, he agreed upon a truce, and setting at liberty old count Guy, he sent him to Flanders, to endeavour to bring his subjects to Philip's terms; but stipulating, that if he did not succeed, he should return to his chains, which the old count punctually performed, and died at Champeigne in the eightieth year of his age. This obstinacy of the Flemings, who were still commanded by three of the old count's sons, obliged Philip to raise a fresh army, consisting of almost all the fighting men in France, and commanded by himself, and his two brothers, the counts of Valois, and Eureux, and the chief of the French lords. The chief command of the Flemings was entrusted with prince Philip of Flanders, who had seen some service in Italy; and after opposing as effectually as he could, Philip's army, waited for it at Mons en Puelle, where he fortified his camp.

The flower of the French troops consisted in cavalry, who Total derepelled the sallies of the Flemings; but their ardour was feat of not to be restrained by Philip's authority. Instead of be- the French in theirs with so much fury, that they overthrew all before them, and penetrated to the royal tent, just as the king was preparing to go to supper. His person had probably fallen into their hands, had not a few lords rallied their flying troops and charged the Flemings with such intrepidity as changed the fortune of the field, so that a great slaughter of the Flemings ensued, and after the survivors had been driven back to their camp, Philip laid siege to Lisle. The besieged agreed to surrender the town, if not relieved before October, when all of a sudden prince John of Namur, appeared at the head of sixty thousand men for its relief. Though honour had compelled the great French lords to serve Philip faithfully in the field, yet they were not displeased with the appearance of the Flemish army, which gave them a plausible handle for advising the king to relinquish an attempt, by which if he proved successful, he might become too powerful for all his vassals. The duke of Brabant, and other lords accordingly pressed the matter so close to Philip, that he gave orders for setting at liberty Robert de Bethune, the eldest son of the Flemish prince, who performed homage for his country, and delivered into Philip's hands certain towns as pledges for eight hundred thousand livres, which he was to pay for the expences of the

the war. Though the event of this campaign fell far short of Philip's expectations, yet upon his return to Paris, he gave thanks for his successes, and endowed the church of Notre Dame with an additional revenue of a hundred livres a year, besides presenting it with an equestrian statue of himself in commemoration of the battle he had gained over the Flemings, which was fought on the eighteenth of August.

Philip's The cruelty of Philip's proceedings against the Knights accommo- Templars, and in the internal government of his kingdom, dation began now to disgust the French. He did not venture to with the resent several affronts that had been offered to the gover- king of nors of his frontier places by those of his son-in-law the king of England, who was in a similar situation with his barons, so that both kings agreed in putting nothing in dispute between them to the decision of the sword. Edward and his queen repaired to Paris, where after being most magnificently entertained by Philip, they agreed upon a mutual oblivion of all that had past. This accommodation became the more necessary to Philip, as he had now resumed his favourite design of reannexing Flanders to his crown. He accused the count of not having fulfilled the late treaty, and the count alleging that Philip himself was the infractor, he and his son were put under arrest, but they made their escape from Paris.

The parliament of Paris was then in high reputation, owing to the indefatigable pains of Philip, who had augmented it with lawyers and presidents, and had fixt its residence, so that all its proceedings were regular and had an air of the highest authority. The credit it obtained freed Philip from a great deal of trouble, by hearing and discussing appeals in person, which were sometimes attended with unpopular consequences. He made no scruple of submitting to his parliament the case between himself and the count of Flanders, who was summoned to appear before him in person. The count sent his deputy, which was deemed to be an insufficient appearance, and Philip urged his suit so warmly, that he obtained of the parliament a decree, by which the count was declared to have forfeited all his estates to the crown. The public, even in France, thought the sentence hard, if not unjust, and the pope interposed by his legate, cardinal Gosselin, in favour of the count. Philip proved deaf to all intercession, and raised another great army to execute the sentence of his parliament, under himself, his three sons, whom with the duke of Burgundy he knighted on the occasion, and his two brothers.

He re-
news the Flemish
war.

Philip thought himself now sure of the conquest of Flanders, but he soon perceived his mistake. The powerful vassals of his crown disliked the expedition, and both his parliament and people disliked the oppressive measures which which his ministers pursued for raising money, so much, that they refused to supply him. Philip was in this situation, and at the head of an army he could not pay, when the count offered to agree to a fresh treaty, and to give hostages for the performance of the terms, and in the meanwhile, to put Courtray into the king's hands. Philip was obliged to accept of those conditions. He found upon his return, that an universal spirit of dissatisfaction at his government had seized upon his subjects, and had he not laid aside his Flemish expedition, a general rebellion must have ensued. Afflictions of a still more tender nature at this time distressed Philip. The three princesses to whom his three sons had been married, proved unfaithful to their marriage-beds. The queen of Navarre, daughter to the duke of Burgundy, and the count de la March's wife, were convicted of adultery with Philip, and Walter de Launai, who were, in regard to their persons, far inferior to those of the princes they had wronged. The ladies were sentenced to perpetual imprisonment, and their lovers, with their pandar, after being flayed alive, were hanged upon gibbets. This sentence did not satisfy the king of Navarre, for he ordered his wife to be strangled in the place of her confinement.

This series of public and private disgraces broke the spirit of Philip, and he died in the forty-seventh year of his age, and the thirtieth of his reign, leaving his dominions in great disorder, through the avarice of his disposition, and the cruelty of his government, which were of more prejudice to his people, than his abilities and virtues, of which he had many, were of service.

Lewis X. surnamed Hutin, or the Boisterous.

THE favourite brother of Philip the late king, Charles de Valois, had during that reign acquired such experience in the affairs of the French monarchy, that he retained all his influence under this prince. Lewis succeeded his father under great disadvantages. The people were discontented, and the treasury exhausted to such a degree, that he was unable, for some time, to defray the expence of his coronation and that of his second wife, Clemence, daughter to Charles, king of Hungary. He was, besides, apprehensive, from the public discontents, of an insurrection which might interrupt the solemnity. Charles de Valois undertook, on the part of his nephew, that the nobility, who thought their privileges had been impaired during the late reign, should be restored to all they had possessed under St. Lewis, and the ceremony was performed at Rheims by the archbishop of that city.

Though

Which is Though Charles of Valois thus retained his influence in governed the management of public affairs, yet the acting minister by Charles was Poitier de Marigni. He was an able statesman, and of Valois. had for his public services, particularly during the dispute between the late king and pope Boniface, been placed at the head of the finances, but he had the misfortune of being as remarkably passionate as Charles de Valois was in his natural disposition. Lewis, in the presence of both, asked the reason why his treasury was so empty. Marigni replied, that Charles had appropriated to himself all the money that remained over the sums disbursed in the late reign for the king's use. Charles resented this boldness; however honest, so much, that high words past before the king, and a duel must have ensued in his presence, had not the other counsellors interposed. Charles, however, remained implacable, and prosecuted Marigni with the utmost bitterness, and with such ridiculous aggravations of the charge against him, that he was accused of having employed a magician to make certain wax figures of the king and his father, to effect their deaths by necromancy, and which had proved fatal to the late king. The judges who could admit such a charge to be brought before them, could not be supposed to be void of prepossession. The king was secretly convinced of Marigni's innocence, and would have saved him, but the influence of Charles was so great that he was condemned by the judges, and notwithstanding the reluctance of Lewis, he was hanged upon a remarkably high gibbet, erected by himself for the punishment of signal offenders. The supposed necromancer put himself to death in prison, the under officers of the treasury were tortured; Marigni's brother, who was bishop of Beauvois, was forced to fly, but the bishop of Chalors, chancellor of France, being charged as an accomplice in Marigni's treason, was acquitted by his judges.

The Flemish war renewed.

The executions of Marigni and of his accomplices, preceded the coronation of Lewis, but the money that arose from the confiscations of their estates being quickly exhausted, new methods were devised for raising more, which proved so disagreeable to the public, that the punishment of Marigni was by the populace condemned as being cruel and unjust, and Charles of Valois was execrated as being his murderer, and the author of all the calamities of the state. Lewis and his uncle seemed to think that Marigni had suffered unjustly. The former left by his will a sum to his family; and the latter fell into a kind of remorse of conscience upon his being struck with a palsy, which he interpreted as a divine judgment for the hand he had in the prosecution. Notwithstanding this, Charles of Valois appeared as haughty and intractable as ever, and in a manner compelled his nephew to resume the Flemish war, which the French in general looked upon with horror. He thought that that a fair opportunity for this presented, by the Flemings being at this time afflicted with a famine; but he found great difficulty in raising money for the expedition.

The vassals of feudatories of the crown were not compellable but to a certain service, and therefore Lewis could have recourse only on his demesne lands, which indeed were very considerable; but his tenants claimed the protection of law and justice, and pleaded an exemption from all extrafeudal duties, or arbitrary demands of money. Marigni, who by all accounts, was a bold, arbitrary, though honest, minister, had disregarded those pleas, and had employed the king's officers to levy by force both upon the nobles and the sub-tenants, whatever taxes he called for. But though he thus used force, he had still some excuse at hand. Sometimes he pretended only to borrow the money he raised, and sometimes he sold the bondsmen (by whom we are to understand the tenants, and subtenants in the royal demesne, who were obliged to certain services, both menial and rural) an exemption from those services, to which he gave the name of selling them their freedom; and he often obliged the clergy to give him the tithes of their revenues. The same oppressive maxims were pursued after Marigni's death; and at last an army was raised for the reduction of Flanders. It was in vain for the count to plead that he had punctually fulfilled all the terms of the treaty, which he had entered into during the late reign, and that he had paid the money for which he stood engaged to Marigni. The king and his uncle entered his country, and the count, who seems to have had excellent intelligence, and to have known the backwardness with which the French soldiers served in the expedition, had recourse to his former practice of deprecating the royal vengeance, and once more offered to put Courtray into the king's hands, and to give hostages for the performance of any terms that Lewis should impose. By this, it seems as if the count had not surrendered Courtray in the late reign, or that he had retaken it. Lewis and his uncle found the army by no means disposed to second their efforts, and they accepted of the count's proposals by taking possession of Courtray. The negociation had been so artfully protracted by the count, that the wet season set in just as Courtray was delivered up, and the king's troops returning to France, the count recovered Courtray. This and the bad faith of the count, who thought himself intitled to repel injustice by fraud, in performing the other articles of the treaty, affected Lewis the more, as he still found his coffers empty, and his people discontented.

Various are the accounts of his death, which happened on the fifth of June 1316, some say, by drinking water while he was overheated, and others by poison, the use of which

which was then common in France, and administered to him by the relations of the Marigni family.

We can say little as to the character of this prince, who reigned but twenty months, and was entirely directed by his uncle of Valois. By his first wife, who was the grand-daughter of St. Lewis, by the duke of Burgundy, and who, as we have already mentioned, was strangled in her confinement by her husband's order, he had a daughter, Jane or Joan, who upon his death became heiress of Navarre, Champagne, and Brie, and who was educated under her grand-mother, at the court of her uncle Otho, duke of Burgundy. His second queen, daughter to Charles king of Hungary, was pregnant at the time of his death with a posthumous son, and survived him twelve years, which she spent in the most deplorable affliction for his death. Her grief was such, that it was thought to have proved fatal to her posthumous son.

France at that time.

Vol. X.
p. 128.

The benefit of the institution of the parliament of Paris, and the introducing into it jurists, or gownmen learned in the laws, was now sensibly felt in France, where the succession both to the crown and regency became doubtful. The count of Valois had in a manner despotically governed France during the late reign, collected his party and took possession of the Louvre. Philip, count of Poitou, the eldest brother to the late king, was then at Lyons, canvassing for the election of a pope; which he thought to be of so much importance, that he could not be drawn to Paris, and he committed his interest to the constable, the count of Eureux, who, as we have seen, was brother to Charles of Valois. The constable forced Charles to surrender the Louvre, and to submit his claim of being regent, to the decision of the parliament of Paris, who gave it for Philip. He was accordingly invested in it for eighteen years, and the seal which he made use of had for its inscription, "Philip, son of the French king, ruling the kingdoms of France and Navarre," This settlement of the regency brought on the consideration of the succession to the crown in case the child, with which the queen was pregnant, should die. No precedent had occurred since the extinction of the Carlovingian line, that could raise a doubt as to the succession, which had always descended from the father to the eldest son.

Doubts
concerning the succession.

The salique law, though since so famous, was at this time but little mentioned in France. The count de la Marche, who was the second prince of the blood, Charles of Valois, the constable d'Eureux, and the duke of Burgundy, were of opinion that the crown of France ought to be considered as a simple fief, to descend to the heir, whether male or female, of the last possessor. In this light, Lewis Hutin's daughter by his first marriage must have been queen of France; but this opinion was strongly combatted by the favourers of the salique law, who were numerous and powerful, powerful, and who insisted upon the females being passed over, and their crown descending to the regent. On the seventeenth of June all parties came to an accommodation at Vincennes. No doubt was made, that if the queen was pregnant of a prince, who should live, he must be king; and it was provided, that, if the queen was pregnant of a daughter, she and her eldest sister should inherit the kingdom of Navarre, with the counties of Champagne and Brie, but that neither of them should marry without the consent of the regent for the time being.

All this while a war was going on between the regent and Robert of Artois, about some estates which the former thought belonged to the regent's wife's mother the countess of Artois; in which the regent was so successful that he forced Robert to surrender himself prisoner, and to refer his claim to the parliament, who gave it in favour of the countess.

John I.

WE are justified in admitting this prince into the list of French kings, because, though he did not live above ten or twelve days, public acts certainly passed in his name. Remark;

Philip V. surnamed the Tall.

THE general sense of the French nation at this time, undoubtedly favoured the salique law, and Philip V. made no scruple of mounting the throne in preference to the daughter of the late king. The old dutchess of Burgundy entered a protest in favour of her grand-daughter; and Philip, though he had gone to Rheims to be crowned, promised that her case should be submitted to the parliament of Paris. Some doubts arose concerning the party which Charles de la Marche, the king's brother would embrace, on account of his hastily leaving Rheims, and not being at the coronation; but that prince was soon reconciled to the salique succession, which opened a prospect of the crown for himself and his family. Philip behaved with vast firmness and moderation at the same time. The general assembly of the states or parliament of Paris, solemnly recognized his right by swearing allegiance to him, and, after him, even to his son, Lewis, who died a few days after. He engaged on his side pope John XXII. who impowered the archbishop of Bourges, to excommunicate all disturbers of the public peace, be their rank or degree ever so high. As the house of Burgundy was chiefly engaged in perplexing his title to the crown, he took off its opposition by giving the county of Burgundy to his daughter whom he married to the duke, and he promised his niece, the queen of Navarre in marriage to the son of the constable of Evreux.

He re-

duces the grievances

All opposition from the friends of the queen of Navarre being removed by those seasonable measures, Philip issued a commission to enquire into the grievances of his people.

The encrease of the royal power continued still to be an eye sore to the great tenants of the crown, because it curbed the tyrannical exercise of their power over their inferiors. Philip instructed his commissioners to declare, that as impartial justice was the rule of his government, so he would not suffer the greatest peer, prelate, or lord of his kingdom to oppress the meanest of his subjects, and that he was determined to punish with the utmost severity all who should have recourse to arms in opposing his commissioners in the execution of their duty. A prince who opposes the oppressions of an intermediate order, is sure of rendering himself popular, if not absolute, and Philip was so well supported by the inferior ranks on this occasion, that contrary to expectation, the public tranquillity was preserved, and the tyranny of the crown vassals was curbed.

The popularity of Philip reached even to the Flemings, between whom, and the French, hostilities were suspended by a truce. When the war was about to be renewed, the Flemings obliged their count to come in good earnest to a reconciliation with Philip. Lisle, Doway, and Orchies, were accordingly ceded to France, and Philip gave his daughter Margaret, in marriage to the grandson of the count, who was to succeed to the county, preferably to his father.

Philip, after that, summoned Edward II. of England to do him homage for his French dominions, and though Edward evaded the performance, he accepted of his excuse, out of affection to his sister, and in consideration of his own circumstances at home. He had formerly taken the cross, and he made it a point of conscience to perform his engagements. This could not be done without amassing vast sums of money; but Philip suspended his intention for some time by the earnest desire of the pope, who was hard pressed by his enemies in Italy. Notwithstanding this suspension, the Saracen princes who had settled in Africa, took the alarm, and according to the French authors, they employed the Jews, who after being banished, had been re-admitted into France during the late reign, to poison the wells and springs all over France. The Jews are said to have employed the lepers (great numbers of whom were then in the kingdom, but kept in hospitals separate from the rest of the people) to execute that most infernal purpose, which they did so effectually, as to thin France of its people.

Vol. X.
p. 130.

About this time, Philip sent Philip, son to Charles of Valois, into Italy, with an army, to the pope's assistance. Philip of Valois, either unwilling or unable to fight Visconti, compromised matters with him, and returned with his army to France,

France, just at a time when the people there, exasperated to frenzy against the Jews, were burning and butchering them in all quarters of the kingdom. Upon the whole, however, this universal poisoning of the wells is a very questionable assertion, and, indeed, improbable; nor are authors agreed upon the circumstances attending it. The Jews of this century were persecuted in more Christian countries than France, on account of their money, and upon the most frivolous pretexts. It is certain that the unhappy victims persisted, to the last, in professing their innocence, and affirming that the mortality was owing to a plague.

Philip V: like the greatest of his ancestors, never lost sight of reducing the power of his vassals not belonging to his demesne. Many of them continued to exercise rights which were incompatible with those of his sovereignty as lord-paramount, particularly those of coinage; and each, within his own dominions, had separate weights, standards, and measures; which, in matters of commerce, introduced inexpressible confusion. Philip issued a commission for enquiring into those grievances; and having received the report of the commissioners, he applied himself to correct them, by entering into treaty with his principal vassals; to whom he offered an equivalent in money for their most dangerous and inconvenient privileges. The counts of Valois, Clermont, and Bourbon, embraced his offer; but the opposition among the other vassals was so strenuous, that Philip found himself unable to complete so good and so wise a design. He had made it a point of conscience to oblige his prelates to reside in their respective dioceses, and they proved to be the most violent opposers of his government and his most public-spirited measures. A report prevailed, that Philip intended to oblige every tenant of his demesne lands to pay one fifth of his income for purchasing those privileges; and this report was so strenuously propagated, that it lost Philip all the popularity he had so deservedly acquired.

Opposition made by the French against Philip's good designs.

It must be acknowledged, that the French nation, at this time, was both degenerate and licentious; and the great feudatories encouraged their inferiors in all their enormities.

Degeneracy of the French.

Philip, among other attempts at reformation, had re-established the chancellery, or the court that had belonged to his ancestors, as counts of Paris, and in which their peers sat. The course of justice in this court had been so monstrously perverted, that the provost of Paris offered to acquit a rich man who could bribe him, and to hang a poor one in his stead, and for his crime. This fact being proved, the provost himself was hanged; and Philip ordered, that all his successors should preside in the chancellery, and administer justice in person.

All Philip's virtues could not defend him from the breath of calumny; and it affected his spirit so much, that he fell ill of a fever which terminated in a consumption, and cut him off, in 1322, after languishing five months, in the twenty-eighth year of his age, and the sixth of his reign; but many authors say that his death was hastened by poison.

 character, From the tenor of Philip's reign, we must conclude him to have been a prince endued with all the virtues and abilities of his greatest predecessors. His chief misfortunes were owing to his being too much of a patriot king. He lamented the sufferings of the poor under his great vassals, who, at that time, were barbarous, ignorant, and superstitious, and placed all their importance in the power they had to tyrannize. The measures which Philip pursued in reducing them were wise and generous; but he was obliged to give way, at last, to their ferocity; though it must be acknowledged that he carried his reformation to very considerable lengths. Philip had the additional misfortune of being ill served by his ministers, particularly as to his finances; but the imposts he laid upon his subjects were by him sincerely meant to be applied to the purposes for which they were levied, and which proceeded from the ridiculous spirit of crusading. It is not among the least of this prince's merits, that he was a patron and encourager of learning, and extremely solicitous to have a learned and virtuous clergy.

marriage, His first queen was Jane, daughter to the count of Burgundy by a countess Matilda, who was heir of the county of Artois. Though she had been condemned to imprisonment, upon the charge of adultery, yet Philip, either out of love or justice, believed her to be innocent, and took her back to his bed. He had by her a son, called Lewis, who died in his infancy; and a daughter, Joan, who was, in her own right, countess of Burgundy and Artois, and was married to the duke of Burgundy. His second daughter, by the same marriage, was Margaret, married to the count of Flanders. His third daughter was Isabel, wife, first, to the dauphin of Vienne, and then to the count of Fecoming, in Franche Comte; his fourth daughter, Blanche, died a nun.

Charles IV. surnamed the Fair.

Accession of Charles IV. THIS prince, whom we formerly called the count de la Marche, had, as we have seen, been an early convert to the principles of the salique succession; and the duke of Burgundy, husband to the late king's eldest daughter, was the first who paid him homage. As the late king was only count of Poitou when the duke's wife was born, the duke claimed that county as her inheritance. The affair was referred to the parliament; who, upon examination, found the grant of the county to have been limited to the count and his heirs male, and therefore they disallowed of the duke's claim.

The reader may remember that Blanche, the count de la Marche's wife, had, towards the end of the reign of Philip the the Handsome, been sentenced to perpetual imprisonment for adultery. The husband was now a king; the wife continued a prisoner; but no divorce had passed between them. The pope was applied to; and he found a ready salvo for His marriage arbitratingly dissolving the marriage, by declaring it to be illegal for two causes: first, because the countess Matilda, who had been mother to Blanche, had stood god-mother to the king; and, secondly, because the wedded parties were related to each other in the fourth degree. This sentence was as absurd as it was infamous and groundless, and fully manifested the pestilent power assumed by the popes of those days. If the lady was proved to have been guilty of adultery, a divorce ought to have passed in course, and none would have blamed the process. But this was no more than could have been done by an inferior prelate; and the pope was resolved to shew his omnipotence in church matters, by dissolving the marriage with his own impious breath. Even when a dispensation from one of his own predecessors for the consanguinity was produced, he set it aside, as being informal.

Charles the Fair being thus declared a single person, he married Mary, daughter to the emperor of Germany, where he intended to establish an interest, as he secretly aspired to the imperial crown; but, about the year 1323, his attention was diverted towards England. One of that king's vassals, who is, by the French king's historians, called the lord of Montpesat, had built a castle upon a debateable estate claimed by the crown of France, and therefore he was dispossessed of it by the order of Charles. Edward's seneschal of Guienne retook it, and put the French garrison to the sword, if we are to believe the French authorities. It is certain, the matter became, in a short time, so serious, that Edward was summoned to appear in the French parliament, there to answer to his peers. Edward, instead of obeying, sent thither, as his proxy, his brother Edmund, earl of Kent. This appearance was, as usual, judged to be insufficient, because the summons was personal; and Charles of Valois over-run with an army great part of Edward's possessions in France. All that the earl of Kent, who remained still at Paris, could do, was to solicit for a truce, that his brother might have time for recollection and making his personal appearance. It does not appear that Charles was in earnest with regard to his divesting Edward of his French dominions; but his sister, the queen of England, a woman born for her husband's ruin, had been so provoked by his conduct, that she had formed connections with the discontented English barons, and with some lords about Charles's person, who entered into a deep scheme for deposing the unhappy Edward.

It was at this crisis that the famous count de Valois, who had so long made a capital figure in the French history, was attacked by a disease which was unaccountable and incurable; and which he considered as a judgment from heaven for the death of Marigni, whom he had procured to be condemned unheard. The count was so much convinced of this, that he procured a reversal of Marigni's sentence; restored his descendents to their blood and estates; and ordered his body to be taken from the gibbet, where it was still exposed, and to be buried.

Intrigues of the queen of England against her husband. The plot between the queen of England and her French and English friends, had been so deeply laid, that Edward found himself in an inextricable toil. He saw himself in danger of being stripped of all his French possessions by the judgment of his peers in France and the arms of Charles, unless he appeared in that parliament; which he could not do without risking the crown of England by the disaffection of his barons.

The queen affected to forget all her causes of complaint, and offered to negotiate her husband's peace with her brother, by going in person to Paris. There she endeavoured to inflame Charles, and all his ministers, against her husband and his favourites, particularly the Despensers; and behaved so much like a fury, that, notwithstanding the differences between her brother and her husband, she was checked by the former, who advised her to behave with more decency; and Charles was so moderate, that he forwarded an accommodation with his brother-in law.

By this time, for reasons foreign to the history of France, the two Despensers having returned to England, joined with the king, and took a severe vengeance upon their enemies. It appears, in fact, that queen Isabel's friends had acted illegally, as well as precipitately, in the sentences they had passed against the Despensers; and had been obliged to sue out a pardon from the king for what they had done.

Her infamous passion for Mortimer, Isabel was deeply in love with Mortimer, the head of the opposition to the Despensers; and, by the force of her intrigues, she procured an asylum for him and all the lords of her faction, who repaired to her brother's court.

proved by her letters. The merit and power of the Despensers, the eldest of whom was one of the most illustrious noblemen in Europe, full of years, but of vigour at the same time, had procured them many friends in France; and the queen had spun the thread of her dissimulation too fine. She had, upon her arrival in France, kept up a correspondence with the Despensers, by letters filled with professions of esteem and friendship for their persons and characters. Edward, on the other hand, had pressed her, in the most tender and affectionate manner, to return to England; and offered to give her security for all attempts that might be made to her prejudice by the Despensers, or any other subjects, be they ever so great. He wrote in the same terms to her brother, the king of France, who pressed likewise for her return to her husband; but he could draw from her no other answer than, that she could not return with safety to England while the younger Despenser was alive.

alive. This answer being communicated by Charles to Edward, the latter sent over copies of all the letters she had written to the Despensers since the time of her leaving England, as so many vouchers, that it was the love of Mortimer, not the fear of the Despensers, that retained her in France.

Those proofs were too striking, and the queen's passion was now too public, not to affect Charles, notwithstanding all the ascendancy his sister had over him. The pope, likewise, interposed in the affair, and wrote a letter to Charles, commanding him, under pain of excommunication, to send his sister and her son over to England.

In the mean while, the treaty between Charles and Edward An account went forward. The seizure of Guienne was allowed to be commo- valid, and Charles was to provide it with a seneschal of his dation, own, till Edward should, in person, make his appearance proposed, before the parliament of Paris; and then it was to be re- stored to him. Edward's ministers were afraid of being ru- ined if he should leave England; and Edward, by way of salvo, proposed to resign his French dominions to his son, who should do homage for them in person; but upon the express condition, that those estates should revert to Edward in case of his son's death; and, that the young prince should not be under the tutory of his uncle, the king of France, nor obliged to marry without his father's consent. Those terms being agreed to, the young prince was sent over with the bi- shop of Exeter, and a noble escort, to France, where his mo- ther immediately took him under her tuition.

It was in vain for Edward to complain of the non-per- formance of the late treaty. The queen of England's in- fluence at the French court was now redoubled, and she pre- vailed with her son to declare, that he did not intend to re- turn to England. Edward seeing himself thus infamously abused, commenced hostilities by sea and land; and the king of Castile joined with the pope in remonstrating with Charles upon the scandalous treatment that Edward met with. Charles was ashamed to give his countenance longer to so infamous a conspiracy against the bed and dignity of a monarch. He told his sister, in plain terms, that he was resolved she should retire from his dominions, and that he hoped she would not put him to the trouble of employing force to oblige her. but broken.

Isabel had foreseen this shock, and had provided against it. Queen Robert de Artois was her friend, and advised her to connect Isabel herself with the earl of Hainault, as being the most likely prince on the continent to serve her; and, at the same time, Hainault he proposed a match between the count's beautiful daughter Philippa and the young prince of Wales. Isabel accepted of the proposal; which, very possibly, was made with the con- sent of her brother Charles; and, upon her arrival at the court of Hainault, that prince's brother, John, in the ro- mantic stile of the times, professed himself her knight, and was by her accepted of as such. As to the conduct of Charles it is pretty questionable in point of sincerity. His subjects had lost no fewer than a hundred and twenty ships in the short rupture with England, and Oliver Ingham, whom, with Edward's consent, he had appointed to be governor of Guienne, had invaded the French dominions. The queen and her party aggravated matters, and spread abroad reports that all the French in England had been put to the sword, which produced an order from Charles for arresting the persons and effects of the English in France, but they were released as soon as the other report was found to be groundless. All the ministers of Charles counselled him to give up the queen of England, and to send her home to her husband, and Robert de Artois was the only Frenchman of importance who openly espoused her interest. It seems to be certain, that the queen thought her brother in earnest, for upon her going to Hainault she travelled some part of the way towards the sea coast, and great debates were held in the French council whether she and her son ought not to be sent over in custody to England, because they had remained in France a few days after they had notice to leave it.

The remainder of Isabella's adventures, her invading England with about three thousand Hainaulters, the dethronization, and murder of her husband, with the accession of her son to the throne of England, belong not to this part of our history.

Charles
aspires to the im-

By virtue of the accommodation we have already mentioned in the affairs of Flanders; count Lewis had succeeded his father Robert de Bethune, in virtue of a decision of the French parliament, and he was supported in it by Charles. The fixing so great an ally as the count of Flanders was, in his interest, was conducive to his favourite view of being chosen emperor of Germany. The pope had befriended Frederic duke of Austria, in opposition to Lewis of Bavaria, who had defeated and imprisoned his rival, and he proposed that upon Frederic's obtaining his liberty, he should resign all his pretensions to the imperial crown to Charles, who was to pay a large sum to Leopold of Austria, the most powerful prince of that family. The emperor

Lewis had some intimation of this confederacy, and set Frederic at liberty without any ransom, by which Leopold was disappointed; but being very unwilling to lose the money promised by Charles, he flattered him with the hopes that the German princes would recognize his title to the empire. Charles was so much bent on that prospect which flattered his ambition, to reunite to the crown of France all the dominions that had belonged to Charles the Great, that he appointed a meeting at Bur jur Aube, to which he accordingly went with equipages and attendants suitable to his quality. He was however deceived in his expectations.

Lewis of Bavaria, had made the princes of Germany that emperor's friend, and Leopold was the only person who repaired to the place of meeting. This disappointment awakened Charles from his dream of ambition, and he was so much ashamed of his project that he never could be brought to resume it.

In other respects Charles appears to have been a wise and His treaty a moderate prince. He considered the Scots as the best check with the that France could have upon the English, and not only cul- Scots. tivated a friendship with them but entered into a mutual guaranty with regard to the succession to both crowns; by which, if either king should die without an heir, male the other was to support the determination of the states of his kingdom in regard to the succession to the crown with all his force. This treaty was the effect of providence in Charles, who saw the probability of himself dying without a male heir, his young son and his queen being now both dead. Charles however, espoused for a second wife, his cousin german Joan, daughter to the count of Eureux, which marriage was held to be valid, though his first had been pronounced invalid, though contracted within a much more remote degree of consanguinity. Charles at this time, dropt all thoughts of ambition, and applied himself to the internal affairs of his kingdom.

The Lombards, who were then the greatest bankers in His ex- in Europe, had found means to become masters of his fi- amplary nances, by which they had acquired most prodigious sums justice. to the prejudice of the public. This being discovered, Charles ordered them to be prosecuted with the utmost severity, stript them of their ill gotten wealth; and banished them out of his kingdom. One Jourdain de Lisle, a lord of Aquitain, a true representative of the ancient feudal tyrants, had been indicted before the king and his parliament for no fewer than eighteen capital felonies. He was related by marriage to pope John XXII. who had been a French cobbler at Cahors, and he thought this alliance rendered his person sacred. Besides that, he was rich, and had no idea of any subordination, especially, to the parliament. An officer summoned him to appear before that tribunal, and de Lisle beat the officer's brains out with his own mace. Without conceiving he had done any thing amiss, he went to Paris soon after, where by the order of Charles, he was arrested, tried before the parliament, and hanged ignominiously on a gibbet.

Upon the death of Edward II. of England, his son, Edward III. (who had by this time married Philippa, daughter of the earl of Hainault) was summoned to perform his homage at the French court for possessions in that kingdom. Edward declined to appear in person, and though he was then embroiled in a war with the Scots, Charles accepted of his excuse. Perhaps his complaisance was owing to the sensible decay of his health. Before his death he exchanged la Marche, Marche, for Clermont, which belonged to Lewis, grandson to St. Lewis, and he erected his barony of Bourbon into a dukedom and peerage.

Death and character. Charles died at Bois de Vincennes, on the first of February 1328, after living thirty-four years, and reigning seven, leaving his queen big with child. When he was past hopes of recovery, during his last illness, some of his courtiers put him in mind of the succession to his crown. His answer was, "That if his queen was with child of a daughter, the states of the kingdom were to nominate his successor. If this answer is true, it affords strong grounds for presuming that the principles of the salique law were as yet undetermined with regard to the succession. The governing rule of the reign of Charles was a good correspondence with all his neighbours, and the princes of the blood, though he was far from being without ambition, and was brave in his own person.

Philip VI. of Valois, surnamed the Fortunate.

State of the succession to the crown
of France. THE pregnancy of the queen involved the administration of France in vast difficulties, which were increased by the great number of princes of the blood then existing. At the head of those was the king of Navarre of the house of Eureux; but tho' he was married to the daughter of Lewis Hutin, the decision of parliament in favour of the male line, set him aside from the succession. The next prince of the blood was the duke of Bourbon, lately so created, and deriving his descent from Robert, count of Clermont, son of St. Lewis. The house of Artois, the third of the blood royal, was descended from Robert of Artois, who, as we have seen, had been killed in Egypt, and was brother to St. Lewis. Robert the third, was then count of Artois, though the county had been adjudged to belong to his aunt Maud. Dreux and Courtnei were two other royal houses, and their head was the duke of Bretagne, who was descended from Robert, the son of Lewis the Gross. The last, but perhaps, the most powerful of the princes of the French blood was that of Burgundy, who by the father's side was descended from Robert, son to king Robert, and grandson to Hugh Capet, and by the mother's side, he was grandson to St. Lewis. Philip de Valois, descended from Charles, third son of Philip the Hardy, had married to the duke of Burgundy's sister. We have not inserted the name of Philip of Valois as a prince of the blood because he pretended to be king, as being cousin german to the late king. He met with a powerful opponent in the person of Edward III. king of England, who, by his mother Isabel, was nephew to the late king, and pretended, that admitting the validity of the salique law, his being a male heir, though by a female, entitled him to the succession.

The appointment of a regent was the first measure in Which is dispute. It was on all hands agreed to confer that dignity adjudged on the heir of the crown; consequently, the appointment to Philip of the regency determined the succession. The French parliament, peers, and princes, and the nation in general were clear that Edward by descending from a female could have no right to the crown of France upon the principles of the salique law, and Philip accordingly entered on the exercise of the regency. Edward pretended he did not oppose him, because it was uncertain whether the queen was pregnant of a son or a daughter; but he declared that he was resolved never to lose sight of his claim upon the crown. For this purpose he sent over the bishops of Hereford and Coventry to assert his claim, as soon as he understood that the late king's widow was brought to bed of a daughter; but Edward's youth and the divisions which prevailed in his kingdom rendered his claim but little regarded in France, and Philip was crowned king, and as such recognized by all the people of France.

but claimed by Edward of England.

Among the first measures of his government was his sending ambassadors peremptorily to demand from Edward the performance of his homage for his French dominions. Edward, young as he was, was secret, determined, and resolute, though seemingly adviseable. His mother, and her infamous paramour Mortimer at that time governed the councils of England, and overpersuaded him to agree to pay the demanded homage; but, before he gave an answer to the French ambassadors, he appointed a procurator, who was a member of his council, whom he obliged to take an oath and to enter in his (Edward's) name, the following protestation: "That, for any homage, whatever to be made to the lord Philip of Valois (then bearing himself as king of France) by king Edward of England, for the dukedom of Aquitain, and the earldom of Ponthieu, he did not, nor would, thereby intend to renounce his hereditary right which he had to the said realm of France, or any way derogate from the same, even tho' all letters should afterwards be signed with either of his seals. And he did farther protest, that he would not do any homage to the lord Philip of his own free will; but as he should do it for the just fear he had of losing the said duchy and earldom: and because he was afraid, unless he should do homage to the said Philip, he could not avoid other great dangers and irreparable losses: therefore, in confirmation of the premises, king Edward caused his said procurator to take an oath, by laying his hands on the holy gospel, before all those of his council then present."

We shall not here enter into any dispute concerning the morality or justice of this reserved protestation. The ambassadors received a satisfactory answer by the mouth of the bishop of London, and upon their return home they made their report accordingly, that Edward was about to repair to France and perform his homage. Edward's magnanimity could not brook this report when it was published in England, and both openly and in private he repeated his resolution of never giving up his claim upon the crown of France, and that the concessions he had made were only to save his French dominions. All this passed before the coronation of Philip de Valois. It was therefore agreed at his court that Edward should perform his homage at Amiens, where Philip was to be crowned in May 1329. Philip aroused by Edward's declarations, took care that the ceremony should be as authentic and public as possible, and therefore all his great vassals, with the kings of Bohemia, Navarre, and Majorca, attended at Amiens.

Upon Edward's arrival there, great disputes arose concerning the manner in which he should perform his homage, and the English and French writers differ so much on that head, that it is to this day uncertain whether he did it according to the ceremonial prescribed by the French court, and which by Philip and his council held to be material to a feudal tenure. It seems to be certain, that Edward refused to submit to some circumstances of the demanded homage. Philip, who affected the utmost politeness to Edward, overlooked the failure, which consisted in Edward's not promising to bear faith and loyalty unto Philip. Edward, while at the French court was master of himself, and attended by a wise vigilant minister his chancellor, the bishop of Lincoln. Philip though he perceived the omission, carried his affectation of politeness so far that he only gently admonished Edward to examine upon his return to England whether he had not omitted some part of the ceremony, and if he should discover he had, to supply it.

it.

The queen dowager of England, and Mortimer, continued to be so violently attached to peace with France, that they condemned Edward for refusing to submit to the performance of the whole ceremonial as prescribed by the French. The princes of the blood and the great lords of France were not so complaisant as Philip, whom they upbraided with his tameness in receiving Edward's partial performance of his homage. The bishop of Lincoln perceived their discontent both in their countenances and discourse, and secretly hinted to Edward, that it was very possible the French king might extend his sovereign power so far as to arrest him; upon which Edward departed for England without taking leave, and was at Windsor before it was known that he had left France. He was followed by an embassy from France, consisting of the bishops of Chartres and Beauvais, the lord Lewis Clermont, the duke of Bourbon, the counts of Harcourt and Tancarville, with other noblemen, who had an audience of Edward and his council, cil, where it was determined by his mother's and Mortimer's influence, that he had been guilty of an omission in performing his homage, and his complaisance went so far as to order an instrument to be made out, acknowledging the deficiency, and promising to supply it according to the ceremonial prescribed by the French court.

The dispute about the homage was not the only one that now subsisted between Edward and Philip. Double marriages between the two courts were proposed, in order to abolish all differences; but without effect, and an embassy of civilians, with the bishop of Norwich, and the earl of Lancaster at its head, was sent to compromise all matters in dispute. Philip had banished out of France some of Edward's French subjects by his right of sovereignty, and complained that some traitors to himself were harboured in Guienne. Philip claimed a large sum of money, which he pretended was due upon the arrears of former treaties between the two crowns, and he complained that four castles had been built upon his demesnes by the English. The prevailing party in the English council insisted upon Edward giving satisfaction to Philip upon all those heads, and Edward still retained so much delicacy for his mother that he was shy of declaring his sentiments, though he sent over the earl of Cornwall to take upon him the government of Aquitain.

Other differences between France and England.

In the mean while, the conferences between the English and the French ministers still went on, though Philip depending upon his interest in the English parliament had ordered his brother the duke of Alençon to besiege Xaintes, belonging to Edward. The latter made Philip all the concessions he could reasonably desire; but being teased by his mother and Mortimer to go still greater lengths, he took a resolution of visiting France incognito with only fifteen persons in his retinue. It is more than probable, that Philip had no real intention to provoke Edward by taking from him any part of his French dominions; but to embarrass him so as to prevail upon him to lay aside all thoughts of his claim upon the crown of France. Edward, on the other hand, did not care what concessions he made provided he kept that claim entire; and he thought that the protestation which his procurator had entered was a sufficient salvo for all he had agreed to. He consented to ratify all that had been done by his ambassadors, though the king of France had by this time taken and demolished Xaintes.

Xaintes besieged by the French.

Edward dissembled so well that Philip imagined he had prevailed with him to drop all thoughts of the French succession; and he therefore not only restored him Xaintes, but remitted the demolition of the castle of St. Croix, which had been stipulated, and even gave Edward a present of thirty thousand pounds Tournois, by way of indemnification for the damages the French army had done him. Upon Edward's return to England he put to death Mortimer, and confined confined his mother, and thereby freed himself from all the difficulties he was under with regard to his French claim.

History of Robert of Artois. We have already mentioned the determination of the parliament of Paris in favour of Maud, who was daughter to the first count of Artois, and in prejudice to Robert, who was the heir male, and who pretended, that if the salique law was to take place in the succession to the crown, it ought to do the same with regard to the great fiefs belonging to it. The matter had been again and again disputed in parliament, but was always given against Robert. Blanche, the grand-daughter of Maud inherited the county; and upon the accession of Philip of Valois, whom Robert of Artois had been highly instrumental in raising to the throne; he demanded the county, and produced writings in his favour, which appeared to have been forged by a young woman who was very expert at that art. So daring an imposture provoked Philip so much, that he not only confirmed the county to Blanche, but banished Robert from court, though he was married to his sister. Robert, who had great parts as well as power, openly vowed revenge against Philip, upon which his estate in France was confiscated in 1331, he himself proclaimed a traitor, a reward set upon his head, and his wife and family were imprisoned.

Negotiations with England. Robert first took refuge with the count of Namur, and then with the duke of Brabant, and the count of Hainault; but all those princes being intimidated by Philip's power, Robert threw himself into the arms of Edward, who received him as an instrument designed by providence for placing him on the throne of France. Philip was vexed at the reception which Robert of Artois met with in England; and omitted nothing to break the connections between him and Edward. At first, he invited Edward to accompany him to an expedition to the Holy Land, and he paid so much regard to the invitation that he laid it before his parliament; who, without rejecting it, desired that the expedition might be put off for three years. This project failing, Philip invited Edward to a personal interview, at which all differences between them were to be terminated. This invitation was attended by a bull from the pope, in which his holiness very peremptorily insisted upon Edward's observing his engagements to Philip.

Injustice of the French ministry. While matters were thus situated, the French government thought proper to seize upon certain English ships, belonging to the port of London, and their crews, whom they imprisoned by way of reprisals. Philip likewise ordered his customhouse-officers to exact from Edward's subjects ten shillings Tournois, for every hoghead of wine brought down the river Garonne. As this demand was unprecedented, Edward resented it with some warmth, and ordered the the sheriffs of London to draw up remonstrances against its novelty, and he commanded his ministers at the French court to complain of it in the strongest terms. We know of no satisfaction which Edward obtained upon this complaint, and indeed the state of his affairs were so complicated that he was in no condition to act with decisive vigour.

His claim upon the French crown continued still to be uppermost in his thoughts, and to influence all his measures both in the field and the cabinet. He was no stranger to the attachments between the kings of France and Scotland, and he knew that David Bruce, though betrothed to his sister, would declare for the French, if Edward should invade Philip's dominions. The hereditary right of Bruce to the crown of Scotland was very questionable, and David had a powerful competitor in the person of Edward Baliol, a young prince full of fire and vigour. We cannot suppose that Edward, by espousing so vigorously as he did, Baliol's right, meant to dethrone Bruce, if the latter could be brought to be quiet during Edward's absence in France, but that being found impracticable, Edward by a series of victories and warlike achievements which do not belong to this part of our history, actually placed Baliol upon the throne of Scotland, and forced Bruce to take refuge in France.

Edward's ambitious views upon France

Philip was far from being an unconcerned spectator of his antient ally's ruin. He long interposed by his ambassadors, and was seconded by those of the pope, in Bruce's favour, but Edward pretended that the dispute was entirely between the two competitors to a fief that belonged to the English crown. Philip did not think it proper to declare himself a party, though he lent a squadron of ships to Bruce. The truce between England and Scotland expiring, Edward made a formal concession of the Scotch crown to Baliol, who did him homage for the same, and thoroughly subdued that kingdom, though his and Baliol's possession of it proved to be short lived and precarious. Edward by his treaty with Baliol had disowned Bruce's right to the crown of Scotland, and Philip generously declared that he would employ all his force both by sea and land in restoring Bruce. He accordingly gave orders for invading Edward's French dominions, and he bestowed the command of twenty-six stout manned gallies to young Bruce to distress the English shipping. This was a sensible blow upon Edward; the English fleet being at that time far inferior to that of France, and Bruce did very considerable damage upon the coast of England, and those of the isle of Wight, Jersey, Guernsey, where he put many of the inhabitants to death, in retaliation for the barbarities committed by Edward in his invasion of Scotland.

Edward

Philip Edward endeavoured to make the pope his friend, by pretending that he was ready to undertake the crusade, and returning to England he was bountifully supplied by his subjects with money for making his grand claim good. He imagined that the frequent overthrows he had given the Scots, had totally disabled them from giving England any disturbance in his absence, and he now meditated a grand alliance with the most powerful of the German princes, which the bounty of his parliament and the vast sums he borrowed from foreigners, especially Florentines, enabled him to complete. Till he could do that, he artfully engaged Philip in a negotiation through the mediation of the pope. Philip received the credentials of the English ambassador, the chief of whom was the archbishop of Canterbury; but, having perused them, he declared he would not treat with Edward exclusive of his ally David king of Scotland. This and other negotiations were only to gain time on both sides. By the advice of Robert of Artois, he brought over his father-in-law the count of Hainault to enter heartily into his designs; and that prince undertook; with a little money to be furnished by Edward, to bring over to his interest the Flemings, who were disgusted with their count because of his attachments to France, and likewise the nobility of the Low Countries and the neighbourhood of the Rhine; and in short, the bishop of Liege, the archbishop of Cologne, the marquis of Fuliers, and the other German princes upon the frontiers of the empire. As to the Flemings, neither their count nor their nobility had any command or authority over them; but they were entirely governed by a brewer, one James Arteville. This vile demagogue exercised a most despotic tyranny over his fellow subjects, and Edward's agent the artful bishop of Lincoln, omitted nothing that could gain him over to his master's interest. All he could do, however, was to get Arteville's consent that the Flemings should continue neuter in the dispute; and that the English should be supplied from Flanders, for their money, with arms and other necessaries. Besides those German princes, Edward had a strong interest among the French nobility, particularly the counts of Armagnac, and de Foix, and those vassals of the crown who thought that their importance had been reduced.

His allies. Philip on the other hand was not without his allies. The king of Navarre, the duke of Bretagne, the count of Bar, and many other vassals continued faithful to him, and he entered into a particular convention with John of Luxembourg, king of Bohemia, the count Palatine of the Rhine, and the duke of Bavaria, with the bishop of Mentz, and other great German lords. But Philip's chief dependence was upon his fleet, which was manned by Genoese, who were then the best sailors in Europe, and continued still to command the seas. That he might keep well with the pope, he detached detached a strong squadron to act against the infidels. Edward having intelligence of this detachment ventured to sea, and in his passage to Flanders entirely defeated the French fleet; they losing in the engagement twenty thousand men, as the English did about seven thousand, besides having their ships so much disabled that they were fit for no operation during the remaining part of the season.

Edward, about this time, sustained an irreparable loss by the death of his father-in-law the old count of Hainault, who had always effectually served him. The German princes were poor and mercenary to the last degree. They had agreed with the earl to enter ten thousand of their troops into Edward's pay; but having received his money they started a thousand objections before they could be brought to act against Philip, who, they said, was then in treaty with the head of the empire. Even Edward's brother-in-law, the new count of Hainault, began to entertain scruples with regard to his father's engagements, and Edward was obliged to encrease the subsidies he had contracted for.

The emperor was as needy as the other princes of the empire, and Edward was forced to see him with a large sum of money before he could prevail with him to invent a pretext for acting offensively against Philip. One soon presented, by the French having taken Cambray, and the emperor, who was then at variance with the pope, created Edward his vicar general of the empire, in order to retake it. Edward, accordingly besieged that city, which was defended by a numerous garrison under Philip's son, John duke of Normandy. He was prevailed upon by Robert of Artois to raise the siege, and to march into Picardy, which he found to be well provided to receive him. Both generals, on this occasion, proceeded with great caution, as the smallest slip might have been fatal to either. Philip found himself under inexpressible disadvantages by the indecision of his allies, the Flemings especially, who, though well inclined towards Edward, had certain scruples with regard to the lawfulness of fighting against their lord paramount, the king of France. To remove their objections, Edward besieged Tournay, and immediately assumed the titles and arms belonging to the kings of France. This was the more necessary, as he had been lately summoned before the French parliament as a peer, to answer for his protecting Robert d'Artois, who was a proscribed traitor, and upon his refusing to appear, Philip ordered his duchy of Guienne, and his county of Ponthieu to be confiscated; add to this, that Edward's assuming the title of France, in the eyes of the Flemings, freed them from their obligations to pay two millions of Florins to the pope in case they should take arms against the king of France.

While Edward was besieging Tournay, his mother-in-law, A truce the old countess of Hainault, who was likewise sister to concluded
Vol. XI. F Philip

Philip, and sister-in-law to Robert d'Artois, offered her mediation. Philip had, by this time, almost blocked up Edward's army in its camp. So powerful an advocate for peace could not be wholly unsuccessful, and she prevailed on both parties to agree to a truce for twelve months, preparatory for a general accommodation, which she did not live to complete. Upon the conclusion of the truce, the count of Flanders was re-admitted to his dominions; but though he paid great civilities to Edward at Ghent, yet he could not be prevailed upon to abandon Philip.

Affairs of Bretagne. Before the expiration of the truce, the dispute concerning the succession to the duchy of Bretagne, rekindled the flames of war more violently than ever. Arthur II. duke of Bretagne, had by his first wife three sons, John, Guy, and Peter; by his second wife, he had John of Montfort, and five daughters. John and Peter by the first marriage, had no issue, but Guy, the second son by the same marriage, had a daughter, whom her uncle duke John, who was the third duke of Bretagne, out of hatred to the wife and issue of the second marriage, considered as his heiress, and she was married to Charles de Blois, who was second son to Philip de Blois, by the king's sister. No sooner was this marriage consummated, than duke John's authority prevailed with the states of Bretagne to swear to the eventual succession of Charles to the duchy. John de Montfort thought that this was an invasion of his right, and no sooner was his eldest brother duke John dead, than he seized his money and made himself master of the duchy. The case was extremely difficult, as it did not clearly appear whether the duchy descended to females or not. Be that as it will, Philip, as lord of the fief, naturally supported his nephew, in right of his wife, daughter to Guy the count of Penthièvre, while Montfort threw himself upon the protection of Edward, who not only as king of France, but in his revived claim to the duchy of Normandy, pretended to be lord paramount. Montfort went to England, where he performed his homage to Edward, and received promises of assistance. Philip summoned Montfort to appear before his parliament, and, he accordingly went to Paris, from whence, being apprehensive of designs upon his person, he privately made his escape. Upon this, the parliament adjudged the duchy to belong to the countess of Penthièvre, and Philip ordered the duke of Normandy to give possession of it to her and her husband; but this decision was very justly thought to be directly contrary to the principles of the salique law, by which Philip was king of France.

Courage of the countess of Montfort. The duke of Normandy, at the head of the army of execution, entered Bretagne, when Montfort, who retired to Nantes, was betrayed into his hands and sent prisoner to Paris, while his wife, who was daughter to the count of Flanders, Flanders, shut herself up in Hennebonne, with her son, then about five years of age. She was there besieged by Charles of Blois, but being a woman of more than masculine spirit and conduct, she found means to send off Amery de Clisson to inform Edward, who was then in England, of her situation; upon which, Walter de Mauny, one of Edward's best generals, was sent with some troops to relieve her. Charles de Blois was well supported by the French court, but the countess artfully negociated a truce, which gave her an opportunity of escaping to England just at the time when the truce was expiring. Edward generously gave to Robert d'Artois a fleet and an army for her relief. In their voyage to France they were attacked by Philip's fleet under Lewis de la Cerda, and an engagement ensued, in which the dutchess behaved with as much courage and spirit as any officer on board. A storm separated the two fleets, and Robert d'Artois landing in Bretagne, took Vannes, which was soon after retaken by the French: Robert being mortally wounded, went over to England, where he soon after died.

It must be acknowledged that Edward's courage and impatience at this time, precipitated him into several dangerous inconveniences. He had found little or no support from his German allies, and that emperor even began to repent of his having conferred upon him the post of vicar general of the empire. The German princes who were in the interest of France, pretended that he could not bestow so great a power without the consent of the pope, and Edward refused to part with it without being indemnified for the expences which it had cost him. He past over to Bretagne, and at once laid siege to Nantes, Vannes, and Guignan, of which he was able only to take the latter, and raising the other sieges he assembled his army near Vannes, where he found himself much streightened by the duke of Burgundy; but pope Clement VI. then elected, interposing, a treaty of truce was concluded, by which John de Montfort recovered his liberty, and though forbidden to leave Paris, he was so apprehensive of designs against his person that he again fled to Bretagne. The pope, who was then at Avignon, laboured for peace, but all he could do was to prolong the truce for two years between France and England, in which the allies of both powers were included.

This campaign cannot be said to have been glorious to Edward, but he profited by every day's experience. Philip on the other hand was the more exorable on the head of peace, as he hoped that Edward would be more adviseable on that point now Robert de Artois was dead. This was far from being the case. Neither Edward's failure of success, nor the restoration of David Bruce to the crown of Scotland, could daunt Edward. He narrowly escaped being shipwrecked in his return to England, where he laid the terms of the truce before his parliament, which was so far from giving any sanction to his claim upon the crown of France, that the members, in a manner, obliged him to send commissioners to the papal court to put an end to all differences between the two crowns by a definitive treaty. But Edward, who was averse to such a measure, gave such instructions to his commissioners as rendered the conferences fruitless. He, about the same time, prevailed with Oliver de Clisson, to declare for the Montfort party in Bretagne, where he was one of the greatest lords. Philip, by this time, began to feel the superiority of Edward, and therefore he sought to strengthen himself by alliances, and aggrandizing his family. Spain promised to furnish him with shipping; he made a most advantageous treaty with Humbert, dauphin of the Viennois, and he ordered a magnificent tournament to be held in honour of a marriage he had concluded between his son, the duke of Orleans, and the princess Blanche, daughter to Charles the Fair. Clisson, who had been lately a prisoner in England for taking part with the Blois family, having been exchanged, he repaired with eleven of his friends to assist at the tournament, which was to be held in imitation of Arthur's round table, lately revived by Edward, where all of them were most treacherously arrested by Philip's orders, and put to death.

Here we are to observe, that the motto of the institution of the garter was owing to those executions, though both French and English authors give it a more romantic and ridiculous original. Nothing could be more natural than for Edward to reproach his enemy Philip of Valois, for murdering the knights companions of this order after inviting them to the tournament; nor could this reproach be conveyed in more stinging terms than the motto he gave to his knights of the garter; intimating, that he meant not to trepan them as Philip had done the Breton noblemen. This is the obvious, and we will venture to say, the true, sense of the motto which has so greatly puzzled and perplexed all antiquaries, English as well as French.

Barbarity
of Philip.

It must be owned, that the French historians have but lamely defended their king from the charge of having murdered Clisson and his friends. All they can say is, that the parties wished well for the Montfort interest; but as no connection appeared between them and Edward, this proceeding of Philip was unpardonable. His barbarity affected Edward so much, that he published a letter which he wrote to the pope on the subject, full of invectives against Philip. He went farther, for he threatened to put to death Philip de Leon, one of the greatest men in Bretagne, and all his French prisoners, by way of reprisal. Upon his cousin the earl of Derby remonstrating to him that, by such a proceeding, he copied the French barbarity, he magnanimously gave Leon his liberty for ten thousand crowns, though though he might have exacted forty thousand, upon his promising to repair to the French, court, and to deliver a defiance to Philip, declaring the truce to be broken. About the same time, Edward made a great addition to his marine, and gave additional subsidies to the duke of Brabant and other princes on the continent. He likewise ordered an account of all the breaches of the truce to be laid before his parliament; which advised him to prosecute the war, but without any papal or other mediation, or to put an end to it, if he was so inclined.

Philip was no stranger to Edward's measures, and published a manifesto accusing him of having stirred up rebellions among his French subjects, and of being the sole and original infractor of the truce. In imitation of Edward, he increased his marine, and ordered his forests to be cut down for ship-building. Besides the king of Castile, who was to have furnished him with a fleet, he gained over the new bishop of Liege, and the count of Hainault to his interest. He prevailed with the pope to create his cousin, prince Lewis of Spain, king of the Fortunate or Canary Islands, by which that prince had a plausible pretext for raising men both in France and England, most of whom he delivered over to Philip's service. Those vigorous preparations for war required immense sums, and obliged Philip, among other oppressive taxes, to lay one upon salt, which is to this day called the gabelle, and was projected by Jews and other foreigners.

In the year 1345, Edward sent a hundred men at arms, and two hundred archers to the assistance of the count of Montfort in Bretagne; and Philip was again, by Edward, defied, as his capital enemy and the usurper of his rights. Both sides appealed to the pope, who manifested great partiality for Philip, and justified his having executed the Breton noblemen. He likewise reproached Edward for the hostilities he had committed in Bretagne. Edward answered this letter, but at the same time invaded France with a strong fleet and army commanded by the earls of Derby, Pembroke, and Oxford. Those troops took Bergerac, and its inhabitants swore fealty to Edward. They likewise were successful against some other places, but the whole was not worth the blood and treasure spent in reducing them, so that the earl of Derby returned with little more than half his army to Bordeaux. The detached actions of this campaign are scarcely worth recording; but upon the whole, the earl of Derby and the English were victorious. They received, however, a considerable check before Blaie, where the valour of the garrison obliged them to raise the siege.

The successes of the earl of Derby were in a great measure owing to the straitened circumstances of Philip. He Edward's had oppressed his subjects with taxes, and lowered the value of his coin, that he might overbid Edward with the princes on the continent, and this had filled his subjects with universal discontent. No man was torn by public insurrections, the people there being always averse to the French government. Geoffrey de Harcourt, a Norman nobleman, of much the same turn with Robert de Artois, had put himself under the protection of Edward, who received him so favourably that he became one of his chief favourites and ministers; so that the arms of Philip were divided, as the duke of Normandy was chiefly intent upon the reduction of his own dutchy. Edward, on the other hand, did not properly support the earl of Derby, because he was engaged at this time in a project equally ambitious as unjust, on the side of Flanders.

His de- The earl of Flanders had returned to his dominions, signs upon where he found a party sufficient to counterballance that of Flanders. Arteville, which put the latter upon a scheme of giving that earldom to Edward and his family. Edward relished it, and proposed his son the famous Black Prince of Wales, to be count of Flanders. Arteville promoted the design, but found that the count's return had greatly diminished his authority. He summoned a meeting of the states of Flanders at Ghent, where he proposed his design. He gave the count of Flanders an option either to break with the court of France, or, in fact, to resign his country to the prince of Wales, who was along with his father to take possession of it. At the same time, he expatiated upon the prodigious advantages that must arise to the Flemings by being under the protection of so powerful a prince as the king of England, who was the true heir of the crown of France.

The deputies of the Flemings, who had met with sentiments very favourable for Edward, disliked that so weighty a proposal should come from Arteville, and demanded a month's time to give in their answer, that they might be at liberty to consult their principals. He undertook to bring in the prince of Wales, (though Edward was inclined to have renounced the project) by the common people of Flanders, without regard to their deputies. He prevailed in Bruges, and Ipres, but found a strong opposition in Ghent, where the townsmen detested Arteville for his tyranny and murders. Edward, while Arteville was in Ghent, had assigned him a guard of five hundred Welch for the protection of his person, and Arteville despising this precaution, relied upon his popularity, so that he was surprized and murdered in an insurrection of the citizens; upon which, Edward, who had all this while a powerful fleet and army lying upon the coast of Flanders, returned to England full of vexation and disappointment.

Edward

Edward still retained his passion for being master of Flemish Flanders, and upon his arrival in England he studiously concealed the disgrace he had met with, and admitted the Flemish deputies to an audience, in which they endeavoured to clear themselves from all disaffection to Edward's person or family, and to represent the tyrant Arteville, as the only object of their resentment. Edward met with a like disappointment about that time. The count of Hainault being killed in an expedition against the Frisons, John of Hainault, uncle to Edward's queen, succeeded to his dominions, the greatest part of which were claimed by Edward, in virtue of a will, which, he pretended, had been made by his father-in-law the late count; upon which, John of Hainault immediately put himself under Philip's protection.

The affairs of Bretagne suffered a revolution equally disagreeable to Edward. He had sent over an army to the assistance of the count of Montfort, who took Dinant, but died towards the end of September. His rival Charles of Blois, improved that event by reducing great part of Bretagne; but the gallant countess of Montfort held out the places that were in her possession with so much valour, that she gave time for Edward's general the earl of Northampton to come to her relief. He accordingly beat the army of Charles de Blois in Bretagne, and took Roch de Rien, one of the most important fortresses of the dutchy. By this time, Philip had succeeded in uniting the jarring parties in his own kingdom against the English, their common enemy, and the duke of Normandy marched, at the head of a hundred thousand men, against the earl of Derby, who by his father's death was now become earl of Lancaster. The latter was obliged to call in all the English troops in those parts, and to keep the field during the winter of the year 1345, but could not prevent the duke of Normandy from making himself master of Mircmont, and other places, and at last, after a brave opposition made by the English generals, from forming the siege of Aiguillon, one of the strongest places in France. The defence of the garrison against the numerous forces who besieged it was brave and intrepid, and the earl of Lancaster, at the head of a flying army, gave vast interruption to the besiegers. It is, however, reasonable to suppose, that they could not have defended themselves much longer, had not certain intelligence come to the French of a new and powerful invasion of their kingdom under Edward.

That prince had dazzled the minds of the English so much by the greatness of his claims and the lustre of his actions, that he had succeeded in uniting the English parliament in support of his most ambitious views. He appointed the rendezvous of his army to be at Portsmouth, and before he embarked he informed his soldiers and officers in a public speech, that he was resolved either to conquer or to die, upon which they unanimously shouted that they were resolved to follow their king to death itself. Edward's army did not consist of above thirty-two thousand men, but they were, perhaps, the bravest and best provided troops in the world. His intention was to have landed at Bayonne or Bordeaux; but the winds proving unfavourable for either of those ports, Geoffrey de Harcourt had leisure to propose to Edward a scheme which he had long meditated, that of landing in Normandy, where the country was more open, and the people better disposed to receive him.

The French court endeavoured to divert the blow by making a descent in their turn upon the coast of England, which was to be favoured by an irruption of the Scots into that kingdom; but this scheme came to nothing, and Edward landed his army at la Hogue, where he seized thirty French ships, and received the homage of Geoffrey de Harcourt, as one of the chief Norman noblemen. All France was struck with consternation at this sudden alteration of Edward's purpose, which entirely disconcerted the operations intended against England. Edward disposed his army into three divisions, moving in parallel lines; that on the right, towards the sea, was commanded by the earl of Warwick; the left, towards the inland, by Geoffrey de Harcourt; and the center by Edward in person; while the fleet under the earl of Huntingdon was to coast along, observing the motions of the army, and when needful supplying it with provisions. Nothing could withstand the English. The towns in that country were then but poorly fortified, and they fell into Edward's hands almost without resistance, till Edward arrived at the city of Caen, the capital of the Lower Normandy.

Edward

Caen.

Philip, and the duke of Burgundy, beheld Edward's progress with great coolness till he laid siege to Caen, which was immensely rich, and not a great distance from Paris. Wealth had made the inhabitants insolent, because they had never formed any idea of the miseries of war. The count of Eu, constable of France, and the count of Tankerville, commanded in the place. The herald who on Edward's part summoned the town to surrender was treated with the grossest abuse; upon which Edward ordered dispositions to be made for a general attack. The townsmen persuaded the constable to lead them out against the English army; but the sight of its array struck them with such terror, that they turned their backs. Five thousand of them were killed, and the earl of Warwick's division entered the town along with the flyers. The constable and the count were forced to surrender themselves prisoners; but the townsmen madly barricaded their houses, and with such weapons as came to their hands killed five hundred of Edward's best troops. Edward, who was naturally haughty and choleric, would have punished their frenzy in the most exemplary exemplary manner had he not been diverted by the earnest interposition of Harcourt, which saved the lives of the inhabitants, but could not preserve the town from being plundered of an immense booty, which was put on board the English fleet, together with the constable and the count of Tankerville, and three hundred of the richest burghers, and sixty knights. Edward, without amusing himself with besieging the castle of Caen, which still held out, proceeded through the bishoprics of Lizieux, and Evreux, towards Rouen itself, the capital of all Normandy.

Edward's exploits at Caen had alarmed Philip, who was then busied in drawing together his army. He ordered the bridges upon the Seine between Paris and Rouen to be broken down, and he himself marched with the army he had collected to Rouen. Those precautions saved the capital of France from falling into the hands of Edward, who, unable to cross the Seine, ravaged the adjacent country, and marched towards Paris, so near as Poissy. It is probable, that Philip suffered Edward thus to advance almost to the suburbs of Paris, that he might cut off his retreat, and finish the war by the total destruction of the English army. He kept pace, on the opposite banks of the Seine, in a line with that of Edward, and assembled an other army at St. Dennis, under the command of the old king of Bohemia, and John of Hainault. He then took post at Pontoise, and hearing that Edward was determined at all events to pass the Seine, he ordered the St. Dennis army to join him, that the dispute might be determined by a general engagement. The truth is, Edward, brave as he was, had not taken his measures so well as Philip had done. He had indeed made a splendid march, but reaped nothing by it but plunder, and the pleasure of desolating a defenceless country, while he saw his enemy ready to attack him, at the head of a hundred thousand men, in a country every where intersected by rivers, and himself and his troops in danger of perishing for want of provisions.

Philip, notwithstanding the superiority of his numbers, still kept on the defensive; but, that the spirits of his people might not flag, he sent repeated challenges to Edward to fight him. Those kind of challenges, at that time, seldom or ever meant any thing more than for one general to invite another to quit some advantageous situation. Edward looked upon those of Philip in that light; he pretended that he was as eager as Philip could be to fight, but was not to be directed by his enemy as to time and place. Edward's true intention at this time, was to secure his retreat to Flanders; but finding the bridges upon the Somme broken down, the opposite banks lined with twelve thousand men, and the French army under Philip in his rear, it is probable, he and his army must have been destroyed had not a Norman peasant, for the sake of a large reward, discovered covered a ford at a place called Oysmont, below Abbeville. Edward marched thither and found it practicable; but Godmar de Fay, who commanded twelve thousand French on the opposite bank, having discovered his design, presented himself to oppose him.

The affairs of Edward were now desperate, as the van of the French army under Philip, was in sight. Edward drew up his army in three divisions, commanded by himself, the earl of Warwick, and Geoffrey de Harcourt. After a most animated dispute, in which the French under de Fay shewed great courage and intrepidity, Edward gained the shore, chiefly by the strength and dexterity of his English archers, who overmatched the Genoese cross-bows, which before that day were looked upon to be the best of any in the world. Even after the English troops had passed the river, the dispositions which had been made by de Fay were so excellent, that nothing but the most vigorous exertion of English valour could have enabled Edward to proceed, but at last, he forced the enemy to retreat precipitately towards Abbeville.

He arrives
at Crotoy.

In the mean while, the van of the army under Philip had attacked the rear of Edward's army in its passage, but before the main body could be brought up, the tide flowed in, which rendered it impracticable for the French generals to cross the river. All that Philip could do was to draw off towards Abbeville, after tracing the march of Edward for fifty miles by the flames of French houses set on fire by the English. Upon Edward's arrival at Crotoy he found some ships laden with provisions, which brought a seasonable relief to his harried army, and marching three leagues into Ponthieu he took up a strong camp near the wood of Cressy, between Abbeville and Hesdin, where, in a council of war, it was resolved to fight the French army if it should advance.

He is followed

Philip, exasperated by the disgraces and losses he had seen but could not prevent, advanced in the pursuit with too great fury, depending upon the number and spirit of his troops, who now considered the English as so many wild beasts taken in their toils. Philip having left Abbeville, sent a party to reconnoitre the English army, which they found to be posted with great judgment, and understood that their strength and spirits had been refreshed by plenty of provisions. The wisest of the French officers were for giving their troops a day's repose; but Philip, though sensible of the justness of that advice, found it was too late to be followed, for he had already drawn up his army in order of battle. He gave the command of the van, which was composed of his cross-bows, to Doria, and Grimaldi, two Genoese commanders; his brother, the count of Alençon, commanded the middle line, and himself the rear.

The battle
of Cressy.

The

The English army, in like manner, was drawn up in three divisions, the first commanded by the young prince of Wales, who had under him the earls of Warwick, Harcourt, and Chandois, with the flower of the English officers. The earls of Northampton, and Arundel, commanded the second line, and Edward himself the third. As to the number on both sides, it is generally agreed that the French army consisted of a hundred thousand men, and that of the English thirty thousand; but all of them trained to arms, and under excellent discipline. Some French writers have informed us, that Edward carried with him a train of artillery which he made use of that day; but that is highly improbable, because he certainly would have made use of it in the passage at Oysimont, where it would have been far more effectual than his long bows; nor does it appear that Philip, though he had much better conveniencies for transporting artillery than Edward, had carried any along with him, notwithstanding it is certain, that the French were then no strangers to the use of cannon.

The French army, though its officers were brave even to a fault, was commanded by men who had no true notions of subordination either civil or military, all of them contending for the post of honour. Philip probably changing his mind, and proposing not to fight that day, ordered them to halt, but their ardour impelled them forwards. A rain that had fallen had wetted the strings of the Genoese crossbows, so as to render some useless, and to damage them all; but the English archers had secured both their bows and strings with covers, and when the Genoese attacked the division under the prince of Wales, they suffered such slaughter, that they were driven back on their second line, commanded by the earl of Alençon. This occasioned a great confusion, which was so critically improved by the prince of Wales, that the French cavalry, of which their second line consisted, opened to the right and left, and flanked the great battalion of the English archers; but by this motion they put it out of Philip's power to support them. The counts of Alençon, and Blois, the duke of Lorraine, and the dauphin of Vienna did wonders, and the English column must have been cut in pieces, notwithstanding the prodigies of valour exerted by the prince of Wales, had not the earls of Arundel and Northampton supported it with a body of troops from the second line, which was thereby so weakened, that Philip was now at liberty to pour in forces to his brother's assistance.

Both French and English historians have concurred in telling us that Edward, who had kept his own division untouched, was, during this hot engagement, coolly observing it from an eminence in the neighbourhood, and that when the earl of Warwick sent to apprise him of his son's danger, he said, he knew his boy, and desired him to fight on, that that he might win his spurs and the whole glory of the day: If Edward behaved in that manner, while the fortune of the day was even inclining against his son, without moving to his relief, we can consider him in no better light than that of a fortunate madman. However fond he might be of his son's glory, we cannot imagine that he would have risked the ruin of himself and his army, to maintain so chimerical a point of honour, and therefore we conclude that the answer was invented after the victory had fallen to the English, and never having been disavowed by Edward, it has become current with posterity.

The French
totally defeated.

Be this as it will, it is certain, that young Edward with the officers and troops under him seemed to receive new spirits from the danger they were in of being utterly defeated. All their second line had now joined them, and Philip, who performed every duty of an able general and a brave man, redoubled his efforts to crush them with numbers. He led up his battalions in person, and fought with vast courage. Every thing was against the English, but that determined courage and bodily strength which ever has, and probably ever will, render them victorious when singly opposed to the French. This at last prevailed. The bravest of the French generals were killed, Philip, was carried wounded out of the field of battle, and the rout of the French became general. Before the victory was complete it was dark, and Edward lighted up prodigious fires of dry wood, which not only directed his soldiers in their pursuit, but discovered the glory they had won.

Authors differ as to the number of the slain that day; but it is allowed, that on the part of the English, no person of distinction was lost but three knights, and one esquire. This we look upon as a proof that the dispute between the two armies had not been so equal as historians have represented it. It was for the credit of both nations that their troops should be thought to have behaved well; but we think it absurd to imagine, that in an engagement of so long continuance, there should be so great a disproportion of loss on both sides, as both were equally well armed, and equally resolute. Upon the whole, we cannot believe that the danger and toils of the English in acquiring this victory was so great as they have been represented by historians.

Loss of the French

As to the loss of the French in this first day's fight, it consisted of the counts of Alençon, (who behaved very bravely) Blois, Flanders, Auxerre, and the dukes of Lorraine, and Burgundy, all of them of the blood royal of France. The brave old king of Bohemia, the greatest and most successful warrior of this age, though blind, ordered his knights attendants to lead him into the thickest of the battle, and to post him so as that he might exchange a few blows with the prince of Wales; but he was laid dead on the spot. Authors speak likewise of a king of Majorca, who fell on the side of the French in this battle. The marquis Charles, afterwards emperor of Germany, and son to the king of Bohemia, who had a considerable post under Philip, was wounded in three places, and forced to retire out of the battle. As to Philip, he behaved with so much resolution, that John of Hainault, was obliged to lay hold of his horse and carry him out of the field. In short, the whole of the French loss amounted to eleven princes, fourscore bannerets, twelve hundred knights, fifteen hundred gentlemen at arms, four thousand squires who rode on horseback, and thirty thousand common soldiers. So great a slaughter in an age when defensive armour was so much in use seems almost incredible, and can only be accounted for by a resolution both parties had taken of giving no quarter. Some have endeavoured to justify Edward, if he issued such orders, by the great danger he and his army must have incurred, had he been encumbered with prisoners. We suspect however, that the loss here mentioned was that of both days.

Philip, that day exhibited, in his conduct, all the power of infatuation. Passionate and presumptuous by nature, he ventured a battle, when he ought to have rested and refreshed his army. He trusted to undisciplined, ungovernable numbers; and the haughty treatment which the count of Alençon gave the Genoese when they were first repulsed, deprived the French of the service of that useful body. Add to all those considerations, Philip fighting before the reinforcements which he knew were on their march, and at hand to join him, were arrived. Edward had intelligence of this, and lay with his troops under arms upon the field of battle the whole night. Next day presented fresh scenes of slaughter. The French reinforcements had been persuaded that the battle which was fought on Friday would have been deferred till the following day, and two bodies of them had arrived near the camp. Of one of those bodies, which consisted of militia, seven thousand were put to the sword by the English, who were favoured by a mist. The other was far more considerable, and commanded by the archbishop of Rouen, and the grand prior of France; and of them few escaped being cut in pieces, as were several straggling detachments.

The victory of Cressy, though one of the most glorious ever obtained, was, upon the main, of no decisive consequence to Edward, who instead of pursuing Philip to Paris, as that prince apprehended he would, continued his march, and destroyed the country to the gates of Bologne, till on the seventh of September 1346, he formed the siege of Calais by sea and land, his English ships, commanded by the earl of Huntington, consisting of seven hundred and thirty-eight vessels. As to Philip, he ordered the duke of Normandy, who had been all this time carrying on the siege of Aiguillon with vast loss, immediately to return to Paris with his army. The earl of Lancaster, and lord Walter Mauny, who had defended the place, then united their troops, passed the Garonne, took and burned a vast number of places, and proceeded with such rapidity of conquest as seemed to take from the French all power of resistance. This glorious campaign was closed on the part of the earl of Lancaster by the taking of Poitiers, which on account of its largeness, he was obliged to leave ungarrisoned; after which, he put his army into winter quarters at Bordeaux.

Edward
turns the siege of Calais
into a blockade.

His answer to
challenge.

John de Vienne was governor of Calais, when Edward made the most amazing dispositions that age had seen, for besieging it. Despairing of carrying it by storm, as brave as his army was, he turned the siege into a regular blockade, in hopes of reducing it by famine. With this view he desolated all the country round. He formed his camp into a city; the tents were covered huts; regular streets, where open markets were held, ran from one end of the camp to the other, and it was surrounded by fortifications against all attacks, almost as strong as those of Calais itself. Philip having reached Paris, was joined by the duke of Normandy, and was soon at the head of another army of a hundred thousand men, intending to raise the siege of Calais. When he approached Edward's camp he quickly saw how ineffectual his attempt must be. He had carried with him the famous Oriflamme, from the church of St. Dennis, nor did the defeat he received at Cressy abate his presumption. He sent messengers and trumpets to the English camp, where they found a ready admittance, but were amazed to see that it contained not only all the conveniencies of a well policed city, but all the magnificence of a splendid court. Being introduced into Edward's presence, they found him and his queen giving audience to the cardinals of Clermont and Naples, whom the pope had appointed to mediate under him for a peace. The cardinals proved no more successful than the messengers, for Edward dismissed them even with some roughness, and without giving them the least satisfaction. As to the messengers, they challenged Edward in their master's name to a battle, but Edward coolly answered, that his business was to take Calais and not to fight Philip.

It was with the utmost difficulty that the latter could keep his great army together. He had established a chamber of resumption, by which he had raised some money upon the estates of those who had committed malversations in their offices, or had been guilty of peculation or robbing the public. He had squeezed considerable sums out of the usurious Lombards; but above all, the assemblies of the states, to their immortal honour, supplied him freely and generously, though all he could raise was insufficient for his purposes.

One of the great objects in dispute between Philip and The Edward was, the marriage which the latter had proposed count of between his daughter the princess Isabella, and the young Flanders earl of Flanders, who had been educated at the French imprisonment, and who was but fifteen years of age. Though the ed, Flemings in general were fond of the match, yet a stop was put to it by the duke of Brabant forming a strong party in Flanders, and offering to bring that country over to Philip's interest, provided he would agree to the young earl marrying his daughter. Edward hearing of this project, counteracted it so successfully, that when the states of Flanders met, no member among them was found bold enough to stand up for the French, or the Brabant interest. The young prince was restored to his country, but declared, that however fond his subjects were of the match, he never would marry the daughter of any man who owed him his father's life. The Flemings were so offended at this declaration, open and generous as it was, that they confined the young prince to Courtray. There he soon learned that his imprisonment was owing to his openness, and pretending to be perfectly well disposed to the match, the young princess was conducted by her father and mother, and a magnificent equipage, to the abbey of Berg. They were met there by escapes to the count, and even the marriage day was fixed ; but he Paris. found means, on pretext of hawking, to escape to Paris, where, according to Philip's views, he married the Brabant princess. The Flemings were exasperated into fury at this event. They besieged Bethune, as the duke of Normandy did Cassel, but neither of the places were taken, and the duke put his troops into winter quarters for the year 1347.

The uncommon rancour which then prevailed between The English and the French, was chiefly owing to a cause blockade which has never been sufficiently explained by the French or Calais historians. The English parliament, was by no means fond formed. of Edward's French expeditions, on account of the vast expence attending them. It is doubtful, if, even after the battle of Cressy, they could have been persuaded to raise the necessary supplies for continuing the war, if the English ministers had not laid before the parliament an indenture between Philip and the Normans for the conquest of England, under the duke of Normandy. Though we are far from vouching for the authenticity of this instrument, yet it is certain, that a new conquest of England was a project that had been long talked of at the court of France, and the discovery, whether true or false, had all the effect which the English ministry intended, by inspiring the people of England with so irreconcilable aversion to the French, that they gave their king liberal supplies for the war. Edward was thereby enabled to continue the siege of Calais, which, according to our best information, was, before the use of artillery, the strongest place in Europe, if not in the world ; and bravely defended by the French. The soil was improper for playing the engines against the walls, and the situation of the camp was so boggy, that Edward had lost a prodigious number of men by diseases. Notwithstanding all his precautions by sea, thirty Norman vessels had thrown provisions into the place; but Edward found means at last, to block it up so effectually, that it was plain it must be reduced by famine, if not relieved by Philip's army, which still lay in the neighbourhood.

Bretagne.

It is hard to say what the event of Philip's attempt might have been, had not his friend and vassal Charles of Blois, been beaten and taken prisoner by the English army under the countess of Montfort. Charles himself being wounded, was sent prisoner to England, and all the Lower Normandy fell into the hands of the countess. It happened by an unusual concurrence of circumstances, that the wife of Charles was the rival of the countess of Montfort, not only in dominion, but in spirit and courage, and collecting together the remains of her husband's army, she put herself at its head. All this while hostilities were going on in the neighbourhood of Calais, but so much to the disadvantage of the French, though Philip behaved very bravely, that he was, as his last resource, obliged to apply once more to the pope's legate for setting on foot a negotiation, which was agreed to by Edward, probably only with a view of gaining time. The commissioners for Philip were the dukes of Burgundy and Bourbon, Lewis of Savoy, and John of Hainault. Those for Edward were the earls of Northampton, and Derby, lord Walter Mauny, and another nobleman. During the dependency of this negotiation, Edward sent Philip the following letter, which he had intercepted from the citizens of Calais, and addressed to their king.

Miseries
of the Calisians.

“Know, dread Sir, that your people in Calais, have eaten their horses, dogs, and even rats; now nothing remains for them to live upon, unless they eat one another. Wherefore great Sir, if we have not speedy succour, the town is lost, and we are all resolved, if we are not relieved, to sally forth, and die by our enemies with honour, rather than to die within the walls by famine; and God grant you power to render to us, or our heirs, according to our sufferings in your service.”

Obstinacy
of Philip.

It is amazing, that notwithstanding all the humiliating blows Philip had received, the conferences that were still continued on foot proved ineffectual through his obstinacy; for he would agree to give up nothing to Edward but the dutchy of Guienne, and the county of Ponthieu, which were in a manner already in his possession. Philip, at this time, was encamped in sight of the Calisians, and still had hopes, through the great diminution of Edward's army by sickness, of relieving them. Edward, to take from him all expectations of that kind, brought before the harbour ships mounted

with cannon, and was supplied with a reinforcement from England. This determined the fate of Calais, after a siege of twelve months. Philip retired with loss and precipitation towards Amiens through Picardy; and the Calisians offered to capitulate for their lives and liberties.

This is one of the conjunctures in which history wishes she could draw a veil over the memories of the great so as not to conceal those of the worthy. Edward looked upon the Calisians as rebels. He considered the duties they had so bravely discharged towards their sovereign and their country, as resulting from obstinacy and treason, and he refused to grant the unhappy Frenchmen any terms, unless six of their principal citizens should throw themselves at his feet with halters about their necks. Eustace de St. Pierre, one of the most considerable citizens, and three others, nobly devoted themselves to the glorious service; and the number was quickly complete. They appeared before him in their shirts with halters round their necks, and he ordered them to be beheaded; a circumstance which implies some inconsistency in the narrative. The prince of Wales, and Edward's lords, interceded for them; but Edward continued, or pretended to continue inflexible. The lord Walter Mauny, his most considerable general, who had managed the negotiation, threw himself at his feet, and implored him, though he had no pity for the Calisians, to have some for his own glory. Edward remained seemingly inexorable till the queen embraced his knees, and Edward resigned the prisoners to her. She ordered them into her own tent, to be refreshed and new cloathed, and to receive some money.

The charge of barbarity against Edward examined.

Though we have, on the faith of the best evidences of the time, related this transaction as they report it, yet we can by no means think that Edward ever was serious in his resolution that the six illustrious Calisians should be put to death. It is true, he might think an appearance of such cruelty might be necessary for the state of his affairs, and in this he undoubtedly shewed himself to be an able politician. As he had taken to himself the title of king of France, it would have been absurd if he had not acted as such, and the cruel orders he gave were the most effectual for persuading his other French subjects that he was in earnest. The granting the lives of the Calisians to the supplications of the queen, and not to his son and other officers, was likewise highly proper, as they were no other than fellow subjects with the Calisians; add to this, that the queen had a kind of a right to such a concession, as she had just come over from defeating David king of Scotland and taking him prisoner.

Calais surrendered.

Calais was too important an acquisition to England for Edward not to improve it to the full. He laid John de Vienne, and the other French officers that remained in it under arrest; declaring that his intention was to people it entirely with his English subjects. If farther proof was wanting, that Edward meant only to establish his claim to the crown of France by the orders he had given against the six victims, his behaviour towards the remaining Calisians would be sufficient. He ordered them such plenty of victuals and drink that three hundred of them were surfeited to death, but the rest, being sufficiently refreshed, were ordered to leave the place; but to be well entertained and guarded till they arrived at the castle of Guifnes. Thus Calais was evacuated of all its French inhabitants but one priest, and two old men, whom Edward ordered to be retained to point out the constitution and boundaries of the place, which soon became a flourishing colony of English, and continued so for above two hundred years. After the reduction of Calais, the pope's legate, the cardinal of Cæcilius, proposed a truce, which was agreed to and continued till the ninth of July next year, to the mutual satisfaction of both kings, Edward's finances being in terrible disorder, and his English subjects discontented at the vast number of their fellow subjects who had perished in his French expeditions.

Attempt
to retake it by treachery.

The truce which had been concluded comprehended Scotland, Flanders, Gascony, and Bretagne, but it was ill observed between the rival ladies in the last mentioned country. The country from Paris to the sea and beyond the Loire was rendered a desert; a famine and plague prevailed, and the distressed situation of his country touched the heart of Geoffrey de Harcourt so sensibly, that he threw himself with a handkerchief twisted like a halter about his neck at the feet of Philip, who raised and forgave him. The plague having communicated itself to England, both kings thought proper to prolong the truce for three years. Edward had named an excellent officer, a native of Pavia, one Aimery, to command in Calais, and Geoffrey de Charni, commanded in chief all Philip's troops in Picardy. Charni tempted Aimery with a promise of thirty thousand crowns of gold to deliver up the place to him. Aimery disclosed Charni's proposal to Edward, who ordered him to take the money, and to seem to agree to Charni's terms; but in the mean time, he privately introduced himself and his son the prince of Wales, into the dungeon of the place, in order to receive the French party that was to take possession of it, and which was to have been supported by Charni, at the head of twenty thousand men. The advanced party were taken prisoners. Charni found he was betrayed, and the English with the king and the prince of Wales, in disguised armour, at their head, attacked the main body under Charni, who, though he behaved like a gallant officer, was at last beaten. In this conflict, Edward singled out Eustace de Ribaumont, esteemed the strongest and the bravest knight in France, as the object of his arms. Ribaumont twice beat the king down, but was conquered at last, and taken prisoner.

soner by Edward, who was so far from treating him as a traitor, that he entertained both him and Charni, (who was a prisoner likewise,) at night, with a magnificent supper, and placed upon Ribaumont's head with his own hand a chaplet of pearls, in acknowledgment of his being the hardiest of all the French knights.

We dare not venture to say that Philip was actually conscious of Charni's design; but it is difficult to conceive how one of his private subjects could afford to lose so considerable a sum, (which actually was paid to Aimery) and to raise an army of twenty thousand men. Be that as it will, Philip disclaimed all knowledge of the matter, and no infraction of the truce ensued on either side. Philip therefore resumed the prosecution of an affair which he had had long at heart. The dauphin of Vienne had repeated his promise, if he died without heirs, to leave his dominions to the royal family of France; but having an inclination to re-marry, he intended to espouse the duke of Bourbon's daughter, when Philip prevailed with the lady to marry his grandson Charles, son to the duke of Normandy. Upon this, the dauphin, who seems not to have been of a sound brain, abandoned the world, and bequeathed his territories to Charles, the very prince who had deprived him of his mistress. This was a valuable acquisition to the royal family of France: Dauphiny, so called from its princes having taken a dolphin for their arms, had been part of the kingdom of Arles, and consequently the emperor of Germany insisted upon its being a fief of the empire; but the longest sword proved, at last, that it was not. Philip likewise advanced a sum to the king of Majorca, who was of the house of Arragon (the same perhaps, who is said to have been killed at the battle of Cressy) and who had mortgaged to him the provinces of Roussillon, and Cerdagne.

Philip, towards the latter end of his life, proposed a marriage between his son and the princess Blanche, sister to Charles the wicked king of Navarre; but being then a widower, he no sooner saw her person than he was so smitten with her charms that he married her himself, as his son did the countess of Boulogne, widow to the count of Artois. The short remainder of Philip's reign was consumed in rejoicings; but he was now fifty seven years of age, and his new queen was scarcely seventeen, so that the reader can scarcely be surprized that he did not survive his marriage a year; for he died on the twenty-second of August, in the twenty-third year of his reign, leaving his queen, who died soon after, big with child.

As to Philip's character, it undoubtedly would have been and much greater than it is, had he not lived cotemporary with Edward. He could not defend his crown against so powerful a prince, and make the acquisitions he did, without immense sums, for which he was obliged to load his people, to whom his haughty temper had rendered him odious. His subjects had given him the title of Fortunate, which can be only understood of his succeeding to the French crown, and of his not having been reduced, even lower than he was, by the prevailing arms of England. But though his people were impoverished and harraised during his reign, they behaved with invincible loyalty, which his misfortunes did not abate. The royal prerogative of France, during his reign, obtained a considerable addition of strength by the introduction of writs of error, which are of the same nature with the English statute of premnire, and were intended to be checks upon the ecclesiastical and inferior courts, who by their decrees or proceedings invaded any part of the royal authority.

Accession
of John
to the throne.

He puts to death
the constable of Eu,

EVERY circumstance promised the people of France happiness under this prince. He was forty years of age at the time of his accession. He had commanded armies with courage, and often with success, and he had managed negotiations with address and wisdom. He had a son, Charles, the same who lately became dauphin of Vienn, whom, at the time of his coronation, he knighted, with his second son Lewis, afterwards count of Anjou, and his third son Philip, duke of Orleans, and Philip, duke of Burgundy, son to the queen consort. When this ceremony was over, he ordered Ralph de Brienne, count of Eu and Guisnes, to be arrested and executed without any form of trial. This nobleman had succeeded his father as constable of France, and being, as we have seen, made prisoner in Bretagne, he had been detained, ever since, captive in England, where an exorbitant sum, no less than eighty thousand crowns, had been demanded for his ransom. He had made several short visits into France, to raise (as he alledged) the money; but John suspecting, and indeed with reason, that he was in treaty with Edward for his county of Guisnes, put him to death in the inhuman manner we have related. His execution struck the French with horror, and the king poorly pleaded in excuse the miseries from which France might have been delivered had Robert of Artois, and Geoffrey de Harcourt been treated in the same manner. He gave the constable's sword to Charles de la Cerda, who as we have already shewn, was descended from St. Lewis; the county of Eu to John de Artois, the son of Robert, and the county of Guisnes to Walter de Brienne, who had married the daughter of the deceased, and who was afterwards constable of France. Though those persons were all them of high quality, yet their not having been distinguished for any public services encreased the discontent of the nobility.

John

John saw them dissatisfied, and endeavoured to put them and in good humour by a profusion of court diversions, and the institution of a new order, called that of the star, in imitation of Edward's order of the garter. Before the death of the late king, negotiations had been set on foot at Avignon and Boulogne, for concluding a definitive treaty between France and England; but they were soon broken off. The war between the two fair competitors in Bretagne went on notwithstanding the truce, with incessant fury; and the brave Dagworth, who commanded the English auxiliaries in the service of the countess of Montfort, was killed in an ambuscade; upon which the earl of Lancaster took from the French a great number of castles, and burnt the suburbs of Tholouse. Edward would have supported him in person had he not been resolved to chastise the Spaniards, who in favour of the French had committed many insults and robberies upon the English navigation. For this purpose he embarked with his son, and his chief nobility, at Sandwich, and went with a well appointed fleet to seek that of Spain, which was then reckoned the best in Europe. He defeated it after an obstinate and bloody engagement.

By degrees the war revived between the French and the English; nor had the peace ever been properly observed. The French had formed a kind of blockade against Calais, and its governor Sir John Beauchamp, was killed in an excursion he made in the neighbourhood, but his successor Sir Robert Harley, avenged his death by signal devastations of the country. Edward, who certainly had gone great lengths in his bargain with the late constable, sent his son, the duke of Lancaster with an army, which ravaged the coasts of Artoise, and Picardy, took Estaples, Fauquenberg, and Terouenne, in which last place they put the inhabitants to the sword for their obstinate defence. He then carried desolation to the gates of St. Omers, and returned laden with plunder to Calais. To revenge this insult, the marshal (for that order had been for some time instituted in France) du Nesle, fell into Gascony, which he over-ran as far as St. John de Angeli; but he was defeated and taken prisoner by Sir Walter Bently, though St. John de Angeli was so poorly garrisoned that it fell easily into the hands of the French.

This loss was more than compensated by the acquisition of Guisnes, a place which in a manner covered the garrison surprised of Calais. Edward had never lost sight of the bargain he made with the constable, and though disappointed, he charged Aimery, who still commanded in Calais, to take every opportunity of becoming master of the place. Some say, that Aimery corrupted Baucouray, the lieutenant-governor, who had been appointed by the constable; and others, that it was taken by one Lancaster, who had been an English prisoner in the place, and had observed its weakness. Most probably, the acquisition was owing to a mixture of treachery and surprize. Charles de Blois was all this time a prisoner in England, and negotiating with Edward about the terms of his ransom. The queen of England befriended him, and was at the head of a party who wanted to persuade Edward to drop the protection of the Montfort party, to marry his daughter to Charles, and to accept of a very large sum from him and his family. Edward was inclining to agree to those terms, when the earl of Derby remonstrated so strongly against the disgrace and dishonour that must attend them, that all the queen obtained was, that Charles should give up his two sons as hostages till his ransom was discharged.

Their

John reproached Edward for taking possession of Guisnes, and thereby breaking the truce. Edward dryly answered, "That he had learned from the late king of France in his bargain about Calais with Aimery, that a truce was no other than a trafficking time, and that it was not broken by buying or selling towns." Aimery seems in fact to have been fitted for surprises of that nature. He was very brave in his person, and encouraged by his success at Guisnes, he attempted to take St Omers, where he probably had a correspondence. Unfortunately for him, Charni was commandant of the garrison, and gave Aimery so hot a reception that the assailants were defeated, and Aimery being taken prisoner, was, by order of Charni, in revenge of his having defrauded him of the Calais purchase money, torn in pieces by horses.

Notwithstanding these, and many other bickerings, we do not find that John was yet in a condition to declare war formally against Edward. He kept a splendid court at Paris, where the king of Navarre, as he was a most accomplished prince in his person, became the favourite of the queen consort, and the two queens dowager, and easily prevailed with John to give him his daughter the princess Joan in marriage. He then hinted to John, that having sustained vast loss by his county of Angoulesme being ravaged, it was but just that he should be indemnified out of other estates. John accordingly gave him assignments to estates in Normandy; but gave the county of Angoulesme to his kinsman and favourite Charles of Spain, then constable of France. Charles king of Navarre, resented his disappointment, in being obliged to part with Angoulesme, in a most bloody manner, for he murdered the constable in his bed, and avowed the fact. John was at that time in so distressed a situation that he could not give scope to his justice, and Charles compelled him to grant him and his accomplices a pardon, upon his submitting to the form of a conviction before the parliament at Paris. Perhaps after ages will have difficulty to believe that Charles before he would submit even to that mock trial, obliged John to give him his second son as a hostage, that no penalty should follow his conviction.

The reader is to observe, that Charles, to whom the French have given the epithet of Mauvais, or the Wicked, secretly thought he had the best title to the crown of France, his mother being the only child to Lewis Hutin, but he openly claimed the dutchy of Burgundy, with the counties of Champagne, and Brie, all which had belonged to his ancestors, though alienated by the events of war, marriages, or family compacts. His escape from justice rendered him more proud and insolent than ever.

In 1354, negotiations were opened at Avignon for a definitive treaty between John and Edward. It is certain, that the latter was so tractable, that in a conference which his commissioners had with those of John near Guisnes, he offered to renounce his title to the crown of France upon John yielding up to him all Guienne, the counties of Artois, and Guisnes, and the town and territory of Calais, free and without homage. Those concessions on the part of Edward, who thereby gained the hearts of his own subjects, were made the groundwork of a negotiation at Avignon; but the daily growing discontent and ambition of the king of Navarre, seems to have influenced Edward to be less moderate. The duke of Lancaster was among the English commissioners at Avignon, and he formed connections with the king of Navarre, who courted his acquaintance, that were far from being pacific. This coming to the knowledge of John, he gave the dauphin, the dutchy of Normandy, where he seized several castles that had been assigned to the king of Navarre. Charles threw himself by sea into Normandy, where his Navarrese soldiers defended his other possessions. This check given to the king of Navarre, and the declared backwardness of the English parliament, had an influence upon the conferences at Avignon, where the French commissioners rejected the terms that had been proposed by Edward at Guisnes. All they could be brought to, was, that Edward might hold the places he demanded, as his ancestors had done, in fealty to the crown of France. Edward was not displeased at this haughtiness, and the rather, as the French commissioners told him very truly, that it was not in the power of John and his parliament to agree to Edward's terms, or to give up any part of the homage due to the future kings of France. The pope would for his own ends have given the French commissioners and their king an absolute resolution from all the obligations which they or their posterity might lie under as to the proposed alienation, but the French haughtily declared that they were ready to defend their king and his dignity to all extremities; so that all the pope could do was to bring the parties to agree to the continuance of the truce till the Midsummer following. But it is now time to return to the internal affairs of France.

French

Paris,

its constitution,

and proceedings.

John easily saw that a new war with England was now inevitable, and that it would require extraordinary sums to maintain it. He had already done more for raising money than his prerogative warranted; for he had circulated false coin, and had threatened those, to whom he committed the secret, with death if they divulged it. All those and many other methods of raising money proving ineffectual, John, as his last resource, threw himself upon the benevolence and loyalty of his people, by calling together at Paris an assembly of his three estates. As this was the most august meeting that France ever beheld, it is necessary here to give some account of its constitution.

The first estate comprehended the clergy with the archbishop of Rheims at their head; the second consisted of the nobility and gentry, whose speaker was Walter de Brienne, the titular duke of Athens. The deputies of the provinces formed the last order, and their mouth, was the famous Stephen Marcel, provost of the merchants. It is here very important for the reader to observe, that the assembly of the states thus constituted was a body entirely distinct from the parliament, the members of which were in the nature of magistrates appointed by the king to decide in cases civil and criminal; but without any feudal or territorial relation to his crown. The assembly being met, the parliament, with their first magistrate, their chancellor, at their head, attended it in the nature of proctors for their king. The chancellor set forth the distressed state of the crown and kingdom. He was heard with great respect, but the members, at the same time they agreed to supply his necessities, hinted that they expected redress of their grievances. They however, voted him an immediate supply, but some difficulties occurred as to the ways and means of raising it. The general sense of the meeting was for imposing taxes during a limited time, upon the necessities of life, to be raised by collectors of their own appointing; but this method being found to be impracticable, it was resolved to raise the supplies by a capitation tax, as had been requested by the parliament.

On the second day of the session they entered upon the consideration of their grievances, of which they produced a long list. They consisted of compulsive abuses of power, enforcing the subjects to furnish provisions for the king's household; of the frequent alterations of the coin; the arbitrary methods of imposing taxes, and other articles too long to be inserted here. John consented to give them satisfaction on all those heads, and both he and the dauphin duke of Normandy, bound themselves by oath to observe them. This ordinance, after all the parts of it were engrossed, might have been considered by the French as the great charter of their liberties; but it was only temporary, and not, like that of England, perpetual. It was not produced by a generous effort for liberty, for it was a mercenary compact between the king and people, who in fact bribed him into the concessions he made, and his posterity thought they were absolved from all future observance of them as soon as the exigency was over.

The assembly before its dissolution voted to maintain thirty thousand men, so long as the war should last; and Mr. Voltaire imagines that the money voted for that service amounted to about nine millions five hundred thousand livres of present French money; perhaps, the whole might amount to about half a million sterling. We are however, to observe, that this subsidy was imposed for two years, and that the thirty thousand men, or, as others call them, Gens d'armes, did not serve by tenure, but for pay, and were only an addition to the feudal army raised upon the king's demesnes, or chargeable upon his vassals. This assembly of states was so free that they considered the money they voted as belonging to themselves; for after they had revived the gabelle upon salt, and settled the method of collecting the duties they had voted, they appointed their own receivers, and a committee of accounts for levying, applying, and distributing the money so raised.

John, it must be owned, notwithstanding the kindness of his states, had a difficult and distressful province to manage. His commissioners were blamed on all hands for breaking off the late conferences at Avignon. He had still hopes of reclaiming the king of Navarre, as several prosperous events had happened to his arms in Normandy; and a negotiation was actually on foot between them during the conferences at Avignon. The king of Navarre had filled with Navarrese garrisons Eureux, Pont-Andemur, Cherbourg, Avranch, Mortaign and Gavre; and as an earnest of his good faith in treating with John, he had actually refused the assistance the English offered him by Edward. He continued, however, still to treat with the English as well as the French court, and he had agreed to have a secret meeting with the king of England in the island of Jersey or Guernsey, to put the last hand to the arrangements they had concerted. These were, that the prince of Wales should be sent over to Gascony with an army, and with full powers to act for his father both in a civil and military capacity. The prince accordingly sailed with a noble attendance of troops and peace nobility, but contrary winds interposing, the two kings with the could not have the interview proposed, so that towards the middle of September the king of Navarre found himself so hard pressed by John in Normandy, that he made a peace with him, and his submissions to him at the same time, upon his being paid a hundred thousand crowns.

Edward was all this while on board the armament which he had intended for the support of the king of Navarre, but was obliged to return to Portsmouth when he heard of that prince's reconciliation with John. This disappointment

ment was much more than compensated by the success of the prince of Wales in other parts of France. He arrived in Gascony on the twenty-fifth of October, and after mustering his army, he drew it out in three divisions, one commanded by the earl of Warwick, one by himself; and the third by the earls of Suffolk and Salisbury.

A curious letter is come to our hands, written by Sir Anthony Wingfield, who was present, and had a considerable command in the expedition, under the Black Prince. From that we learn, that he destroyed all the fortified places in the county of Armagnac, that he carried fire, sword, and desolation through Quercy, Berry, and Touraine. Nothing resisted him, and being followed by the pope's legates, he refused to treat of an accommodation, but referred them to his father. The number of his troops has been differently represented, though we are apt to believe that when he set out upon his march he had not with him above twelve thousand men; but they were veterans, and the best soldiers in the world. The description of the desolation which he spread every where is shocking to humanity, but was suitable to the rancour that prevailed between the two nations, and the booty he made was amazing. He was opposed by the constable of Bourbon, the marshal Clermont, and the count of Armagnac (I keep by Wingfield's account which must be more accurate than that of any later writer); but the disagreement among the French generals did not suffer them to unite their forces, so as to oppose him with any considerable effect, and the prince continued his destructive progress; during which he burnt the towns of Plaisance, St. Bertrand, Narbonne, and other places, and all this in sight of a superior army.

John beheld, with grief, the fairest and richest provinces of his kingdom, thus either reduced or ruined by his enemies; but, before he could check them, it was necessary to strike an important blow. The king of Navarre, notwithstanding the late accommodation, still continued his intrigues, and had even debauched from his duty the dauphin, with the counts of Foix, Namur, Harcourt, and other young noblemen. He prevailed with the dauphin to resolve upon taking refuge in the emperor of Germany's court, on pretence of his not having a sufficient share of authority at home. John having a perfect information of all those, and many other intrigues, on the fifth of April, 1356, left Vernouille suddenly, attended by the princes of the blood about his person, and about two hundred chosen guards; and pushing on to Rouen, where the king of Navarre was, he there entered the castle, surprized the king and his company as they were sitting down to dinner, caused him to be put under an arrest, dined on the dishes provided for them, and, in the afternoon, ordered the heads of Lewis, count of Harcourt, the lord Graville, the lord Maubue, and Oliver Doublet, to be struck off, off, and their bodies to be hanged on gibbets. He then commanded the dauphin, and the other prisoners, to be set at liberty ; but sent the king of Navarre a close prisoner to Paris, with orders that he should be strictly confined in the chastelet. This determined, though bloody, measure proved unsuccessful. Philip, the king of Navarre's brother, and the famous Geoffrey Harcourt, uncle to the count, flew to arms, and put themselves under the protection of Edward ; so that all Normandy and Bretagne were again involved in the flames of war.

Edward, in the mean while, had landed in France ; but, Edward though he mustered a noble army, and had under him excellent officers, he did nothing worthy of his high renown. John was then lying with a great army at Amiens, and prudently acted on the defensive. The English attempted to take Hesdin, but were repulsed ; and Edward found his army so much incommoded by the dispositions John made, that he retired, perhaps with some precipitation, to Calais. John considered this as a victory, and called upon Edward to fight him in what manner, and with what numbers, he pleased. Edward disdained the challenge ; but we cannot say what the event might have been, had not Edward's intelligence from England rendered his presence there absolutely necessary to repel the Scots, who had been spirited up by John to invade his kingdom.

The war was, all this while, raging in Normandy and Bretagne, where the duke of Lancaster commanded for Edward. Philip of Navarre had received a reinforcement from England under Sir Miles Stapleton, with promises of farther assistance from the duke of Lancaster ; but John now resolved to stake his fortune upon one decisive blow, by attacking the prince of Wales, who, he understood, had no more than eight thousand men with him. The prince was then returning from his expedition by the way of Quercy and Auvergne, and had been repulsed at Bourges Yssodun, when he heard that John, having collected all the force of his kingdom, was on the other side of the Loire. The prince called a council of war, where it was resolved to return to Bourges by the way of Xantaigne. He took the town of Remorentin, and continued his ravages through Touraine and Anjou ; but he began now to find, that his army, small as it was, had difficulty to subsist itself, chiefly through the ravages it had committed.

John, with his army, passed the Loire at Orleans, Mehun, Tours and Saumur ; that, by thus extending its lines, he might hem the prince in on every side ; and his dispositions were so wise and proper, that, in this, he was perfectly successful. The Black Prince now found that, in pursuit of glory, he had been guilty of a thousand wanton barbarities and errors in conduct. He entrenched himself at Maupey, near Poitiers ; and, had John persevered in his cool, cautious cautious measures, he must have surrendered, without fighting, through want of provisions.

who rejects all his offers.

The dispositions made by the prince were the best that his melancholy situation could admit of; and cardinal Talyrand, on the part of the pope, interposed for an accommodation. The prince appeared to be very tractable, and was willing to give every thing up but his own, his country's, and his father's honour; to resign his conquests, release his prisoners, and to swear not to bear arms against France for seven years. John madly and haughtily, notwithstanding all the cardinal's remonstrances, insisted upon the prince, and an hundred of his chief nobility and officers, surrendering themselves prisoners of war. The prince rejected this condition with becoming indignation, and both sides prepared for battle.

Poitiers.

The army under John was one of the best, though not the most numerous, that any king of France had ever brought to the field. By the most moderate accounts, it consisted, at least, of sixty thousand horse, besides infantry; and, being drawn up in three lines, it appeared equally terrible and glorious. The first was commanded by the duke of Orleans, John's brother; the second by the dauphin, and his two brothers, the dukes of Anjou and Berry; and the third, in which was the flower of the troops and nobility, by John in person. That prince's confidence and assurance of victory caused him to overlook a number of provident dispositions made by the prince; and, after having made his dismounted cavalry cut their spears to the length of five feet, that they might fight more closely, he was so ill informed as to order a body of horse to the attack through a lane, which the prince had privately lined with English archers. This body was backed by another of dismounted cavalry and German curassiers; but they were so galled by the English, that they fell into disorder, and recoiling on their second line, the English made an indiscriminate slaughter of both. The great division under John himself next moved against the prince; and here the battle was so severe and bloody, that three of John's sons abandoned the field, and left him with the youngest.

prisoner.

It must be acknowledged that no prince ever fought more bravely than John did in his own person, and he was well seconded by his youngest son; but nothing could resist the compacted force of the English column, which bore down all before it; and, as their danger grew, seemed to acquire new vigour. The best and bravest of John's friends were now killed; and one Sir Dennis, of Morbeque, a knight of Artois, whom John had banished from France, called out to him, That his longer resistance was madness, and that he himself was a knight. An Englishman, John de Pelham, ancestor to the present duke of Newcastle, had, by this time, disarmed John of his sword; but that prince knowing Morbeque to be a knight

a knight, threw him his right hand gauntlet, in token that he surrendered to him. Pelham's claim, however, was admitted both by the prince and his father; and his descendants, to this day, bear, as part of their arms and crest, the buckle of John's sword-belt.

It is said, and the fact is not improbable, that twenty of John's lords were that day dressed in armour resembling his; and the prince of Wales, having no certainty of his fate, had retired to repose himself under an open tent, when the earl of Warwick, whom he had sent out for that purpose, introduced the royal prisoner into his presence. The humanity, respect, and modesty, with which the prince received John, is so celebrated in history, that we shall not dwell upon it here. Even John himself was touched, though he was not very susceptible of the tender or humane passions. He said that two things gave him comfort: the first, that he was a captive to so deserving a prince; and the other, that he was taken fighting with his sword in his hand.

It was then almost dark; for which reason the prince ordered the pursuit to stop, as the number of the French were still double to that of his army; and this is the reason why the slaughter of the French at Poitiers was not so great as it had been at Cressy. It was, however, very considerable. Two dukes and nineteen counts of France were killed, as were six thousand men at arms; by which we suppose are meant the troops raised by the assembly of the states, and about eight thousand common soldiers. The number of prisoners, besides the king and his youngest son, were seventeen counts, fifteen hundred barons, knights, and esquires; and the common men almost doubled the English army. The prince, wisely considering his situation, gave way to the dismissal of all the prisoners upon their parole of honour, but those whose ransom exceeded fifteen thousand crowns; and it is said, to the honour of the French, that they most punctually discharged their engagements. The prince profited by the errors he had committed, and considered his victory as an additional motive for caution. The booty which his soldiers had acquired through the madness of the French, who marched rather as if they were to parade than to fight, is incredible; and was a fresh incitement for their enemies to attack him; so that, after his royal guest was sufficiently refreshed, he abandoned all thoughts of any farther operations, and returned to Bordeaux. He accounted his safe arrival to be next to miraculous; because, if the French had recovered their consternation, and re-united in a body, they might easily have destroyed all the English army under the prince, recovered their captive king and nobility, and regained the immense plunder they had lost. Being arrived at Bordeaux, the prince's moderation was such, that though he had great causes of complaint against cardinal Tal- lyrand,

lyrand, he suffered him to renew the negotiations for a treaty of peace and ransom ; but Edward hearing of this, insisted upon John, and the other illustrious captives, being sent over to England, which they accordingly were.

Incredible
factious-ness of the
nation.

Some time before the battle of Poitiers, the king of Navarre, the duke of Lancaster, and the other heads of the English interest in Bretagne, had laid a scheme for marching to the relief of the prince of Wales ; but that being found impracticable, the duke of Lancaster besieged Rennes, while Geoffrey de Harcourt invaded Normandy ; and the king of Navarre went over to England. The dauphin took hold of that opportunity to assemble the states of France once more at Paris ; but the factiousness of the French nation, at that time, is inconceivable. The last assembly of the states had instructed the vassals of the crown in the original free nature of the feudal constitution, to which they stuck ; and they refused to perform any extra-feudal services, even to the raising their king's ransom, but upon their own terms. They could not agree as to the first principles of their government ; but all concluded, that the power of the crown was then far greater than it had been in former times. Without entering into any consideration of their king's captivity, or the danger of their country, they complained of their grievances ; factious committees were appointed, and six of their members were nominated for carrying the sense of the whole to the regent, who had assumed the title of his father's lieutenant. They demanded, that seven of the principal ministers of state should be displaced, and their estates confiscated ; that the king of Navarre should be restored to his liberty ; and the lieutenant himself, or, as others call him, the regent, should be under the controul of six and thirty of their members. These propositions were rejected by John, who was still at Bordeaux ; and the Parisians fortified their city.

Attempt
towards a peace.

The regent behaved with great moderation but firmness, and resolved to avail himself of the good disposition that appeared in other provinces, the spirit of disloyalty raging chiefly at Paris and its neighbourhood. Geoffrey de Harcourt was defeated and killed by the lord Robert Clermont while he was invading Normandy ; the regent got possession of Pont-l'arch ; and other favourable events befriended the regent. The pope formed a plan of general pacification between France and England, to be executed by the emperor of Germany, who called a diet at Metz for that purpose ; where he appeared attended by the regent, his great German officers, and twenty thousand horse ; but this tentative, like others of the same kind, came to nothing. Edward, however, had his reasons, the chief of which was the prior title of the king of Navarre, and that prince's abandoned character, for concluding a truce on the twenty-third of March, 1357 ;
and

and ordered the duke of Lancaster to raise the siege of Rennes.

The truce between France and England, by a strange fa- Barbarous tality, rather augmented than abated the miseries of France. inferrec-It filled the kingdom with disbanded soldiers, the worst of tion of the all ruffians, who were ready to serve whatever party could French give them bread and plunder. The war continued between peasants, the houses of Navarre and Valois, but they were unable to called the give employment to so many hands as were idle; and the Jacque- remainder confederating together, laid all the open country, trie, even to the gates of Avignon, where the pope resided, under contribution. This was a new species of calamity, and soon after afflicted, not only France, but Italy, in the most alarming manner: but even that scourge was slight, when compared to the universal degeneracy of manners that now prevailed amongst the French nobility. Both John and Edward had a turn for magnificence which sometimes broke into their most serious concerns; and the French nobility, looking upon themselves as being now without a head, thought that they had regained possession of their power to oppress their inferiors. This introduced the most inexpressible scenes of disorder. The peasantry were stripped and robbed by their lords, who insulted them with the most contemptuous expressions, and treated them, in a literal sense, like beasts of burden, that they might make a display of their own luxury and extravagance.

Human nature could not support so much misery; and the sup-peasants about Beauvois ran immediately to the extreme of pressed-cruelty. They seized what rustic weapons came to their hands; they united in a body, and set out with a resolution of murdering all the nobility and their families wherever they could find them; which they punctually executed as far as was in their power. The nobility of all denominations were forced to remain on their own defence; and being possessed of all the arms of the kingdom, the Jacquetrie, as the insurgents were called, were soon suppressed. The duke of Orleans cut in pieces about ten thousand of them in the neighbourhood of Paris; as the king of Navarre, who was now freed from his prison, did twelve thousand more,
with their chief, one Caillet, at their head.

The cool sagacious regent beheld those disorders, as well Attempt as the madness of the Parisians, with some degree of inward for raising satisfaction, as they pointed out the necessity of restoring money for the civil government, by paying his father's ransom. He the king's may, at this time, be considered as the head of a small party, ransom, but that composed of all the men of sense and virtue in the kingdom; and the king of Navarre as the oracle of frenzy and faction. The regent agreed, that no less than seventy cities and towns should be permitted to send deputies to Pa- ris, to consult upon the state of the nation. This he did because the spirit of faction was not so strong in the provinces

as in the capital : but when those deputies reached Paris, they were seized with the same fury of sedition as the Parisians. They refused to come to any resolutions but such as were derogatory and destructive to the lawful government. They were, in all their mad proceedings, guided by the bishop of Laon, Pequigny, and Marcel, the provost of the merchants. The king of Navarre both hated and feared those demagogues, but they were useful to his interest. In like manner, he was taking secret measures for getting himself declared king of France preferably both to John and Edward; but he durst not break with the latter.

proves in- The dauphin-regent dissembled all ; and affecting respect effectual. and reverence for the king of Navarre, he gave him what terms he pleased to demand. Those were so disgraceful to the royal authority, that the loyalists in the provinces refused to execute them ; which prolonged the war in Normandy, where the king's officers refused to give up to the Navarese the places that had been ceded to him by the dauphin ; because he took care they should know that the cessions were drawn from him by compulsion. It soon appeared that, if the king of Navarre had the brightest parts, the regent had the soundest judgment.

Barbarity The exorbitant proceedings of the king of Navarre, who, of Marcel, by his actions, plainly pointed at a principle which he did provost of not avow, began to open the eyes of many, who had been Paris, indifferent before as to both parties ; and they declared for who puts the regent. This gave him encouragement to appear abroad, two mar- and to practise some of those arts of popularity in which the shals of king of Navarre was so expert. That prince was then in France to Normandy, endeavouring to reduce it into his own power ;
death. and imputing the opposition he met with to a secret collusion between the regent and the loyal officers in that province, he gave way to many barbarous proceedings against the dauphin's party. The faction in Paris upbraided the dauphin with the king of Navarre's excesses, and began to be alarmed equally at the dauphin's popularity and the in-dependant manner in which the Navarese acted. The treasurer of France had been assassinated by a low wretch, who took refuge in a church ; from whence, by the dauphin's order, he was dragged by the marshals of Dauphine and Champagne (others call them Clermont and Constance) and executed on a gibbet. Marcel had employed the murderer ; and the bishop of Paris complaining of the violation his church had suffered ; Marcel went, at the head of his ruffian crew, to the dauphin's palace ; where, in his presence, he butchered the two marshals. Some of their blood spouting upon the dauphin's cloaths, he asked, whether the same fate was designed for him. Marcel told him no ; and, to protect him, he put upon his own head the embroidered hat the dauphin wore, and gave him his own blue hat,

The

The reader is here to be informed that the factious party and forces had particular dresses to distinguish them, and the dauphin the dauphin was forced to carry his dissimulation so far as to wear one of them. Some time before, he had, by losing his hair and nails, recovered his suspected that he was poisoned by the king of Navarre; but liberty. he was cured by the skill of the emperor's physician. He durst not openly complain even of this infamous attempt; but all the provinces of France saw, with detestation, that his silence was owing to fear and constraint. The faction had, by this time, formed a kind of system of future government. The king was thereby deprived of almost all the executive power, which was to be lodged in the third estate, or what we may call the order of burgeses; and they had the presumption to communicate it to the provinces for their approbation; but it was by them rejected with infinite contempt. Every day's disorder gave a fresh advantage to the regent. The king of Navarre continued still in Normandy; and the regent's dissimulation had thrown him so far off his guard, that, at times, he made no secret of his designs upon the crown of France; and he had, even in the regent's presence, executed some acts which amounted to an assumption of the royal authority.

It is surprising that, notwithstanding all the violence and madness of party, the parliament still continued to be respected; and, during the absence of the king of Navarre, the dauphin prevailed upon them formally to recognize him as regent. He then gave the chancellor of Normandy the great-seal, and created Moreaux de Fiennes constable of France. He soothed Marcel so artfully, that he made him his friend; and escaping from Paris to Compeigne, he there found a noble army ready to receive him; while the states of Picardy and Champagne acknowledged his authority, and entered into an association for his defence.

The king of Navarre was greatly alarmed at all this, and The king condescended to have an interview with the dauphin, who of Navarre resolutely demanded satisfaction for the blood of the two marshals, and that the ring-leaders should be given up to public governor of justice. Marcel being made acquainted, by the king of Navarre, with the purport of this interview, put his party under arms; mounted the walls of Paris with artillery, and invited the king of Navarre to be its governor. He accepted of the offer; and taking upon him the office, Marcel and his party entered into an association to get his commission authenticated by the other cities of the kingdom; and the king of Navarre, on his side, promised to stand by them against all persons whatsoever, the king (whom he knew to be a prisoner) excepted.

The regent continued to behave with wonderful address and moderation. By his mildness and affability, he won over to his side the Jacquetrie, who were still very numerous, and he was soon at the head of thirty thousand men. The opposite faction was not idle. They opposed the regent in the field, when he was directing his march to Paris, and some blood was spilt between them. The regent, at last, appeared before the gates of Paris, where he now had a strong party, which was encreased by the miseries the citizens began to suffer, when the regent made such dispositions of his troops as cut off all supplies. The royal party, at last, prevailed so much, that the king of Navarre thought proper to encamp with his troops at St. Dennis; and he scarcely left the city, when the loyalists within it, cut off three hundred English who were in his service; and all their countrymen in Paris must have shared the same fate, had they not been advertised by Marcel of their danger, and escaped to the king of Navarre's camp.

The loyal Parisians declared war against the English at St. Dennis, who cut six hundred of them in pieces in their march to attack them; but the factious provost now found he must be crushed by the collision of parties, and delivered himself up so far to the king of Navarre, that he agreed to proclaim him king of France in Paris, in right of his mother, on the first of August ensuing. He accordingly, on that day, repaired to the gate to admit the king; but his design taking air, a loyalist, one Maylard, cleft his skull with a pole-axe; and some of his most factious attendants were dispatched, in like manner, by the other loyalists. The cause of the regent now became popular in Paris, into which he was admitted with the acclamations of the giddy vulgar; and the king of Navarre, from defending that capital, now made preparations to besiege it, and entered into fresh engagements with Edward. But, in order to understand the spring of the great events that followed, it is necessary we should now attend the negotiations that were carrying on in England.

Treaty in England
about John's liberty.

The magnanimity of Edward was not of that kind which is proof against every change of fortune. It often plying under his ambition, and sometimes his necessities, not to mention the fordid practice of the age in demanding exorbitant ransoms for their prisoners. There is some reason for supposing that, upon cooler reflections, he began to think that the king of Navarre's maternal title to the crown of France was preferable to his. This will appear to any one who reflects, that, if Edward derived any right from his mother, all the kings of France, since the reign of Lewis Hutin, must have been usurpers; because they had reigned in prejudice of the king of Navarre, whose right was the same with that of Edward, but prior in point of time.

Whatever may be in this, it is certain that Edward had become more practicable than he had formerly been as to his claim of the French crown. His son, the amiable prince of Wales, had always secretly condemned it; and he made use of a conqueror's right to prevail with his father to make John's residence in England as comfortable and honourable as his situation could admit of. Nay, he went farther; for he was continually pressing his father to agree to a definitive treaty upon moderate terms, and to restore the royal prisoner to his dominions. Edward, who had some intimation of the king of Navarre's true views, by certain incautious declarations he had publicly made at Paris, began to feel John's pulse as to peace. He hinted, that he might regain his liberty and crown if he would hold the latter as a feudatory of England. John magnanimously rejected the condition, which encreased the prince of Wales's esteem for his person.

He prevailed with his father to make other proposals; and it was, at last, agreed, that Normandy, the Boulognese, and the county of Guisnes, should be added to Edward's other French possessions, without his doing any homage for them; and that John should pay the sum of five hundred thousand pounds for his ransom. This agreement was no sooner made than the breach happened between the king of Navarre and the Parisians; and very probably the propositions made by the king of Navarre had altered his mind; for some writers tell us, that, when part of John's ransom came to England, Edward refused to accept of it, because no hostages had been sent over for the payment of the remainder.

The negotiation, however, came to the king of Navarre's knowledge; and he began to consider that he could not depend upon Edward, or upon the English troops who were in his pay. He might, indeed, by their means, have succeeded in forcing the Parisians to a capitulation; but he was exposed to inevitable destruction, if an accommodation between Edward and John should take place. Upon the whole, he came to the wise resolution of saving himself by saving France; which could only be done by entering into an agreement with the regent. The cardinals of Perigord and St. Vitalis were employed as mediators. An interview succeeded between the two parties, and the accommodation was concluded, on moderate and friendly terms, on both sides, at Vernon. The king swore constant fidelity to the crown of France; and the regent promised to pardon all the king of Navarre's friends, excepting a few, whom his honour obliged to punish. Philip of Navarre, the king's brother, opposed this treaty to the utmost; and when it was concluded, he upbraided his brother, to his face, of his ingratitude and treachery to Edward, and with his having been bewitched by the arts of the regent.

Edward had not foreseen this event, which inclined him to resume the negotiation with John; whose situation in England, notwithstanding the outward civilities and honours paid him, was very uncomfortable. He had seen many of his great lords, in a manner, exulting in his captivity. The assembly of his states, far from raising money for his ransom, had attacked his lawful prerogative ; and his queen had so little regard paid her, though a princess of the most consummate merit, that she had been obliged to retire to Burgundy, where she died.

At last, in the beginning of the year 1359, the conferences were renewed ; but John found that Edward had advanced in his demands, by adding so great a number of places to those contained in the late treaty, as rendered him greatly superior to John in his own kindom. Among other demands, he insisted upon his receiving homage, as duke of Normandy, for the dutchy of Bretagne ; and of his being paid four millions of crowns of gold for the ransom of John and the other French lords who were prisoners in England. John agreed to all ; and, with the lord James, of Bourbon, signed and sealed the treaty, and transmitted it to France, there to be ratified.

The treaty for his ransom rejected by his states. We hazard little in saying, that, in agreeing to those terms, John meant only to manifest to Edward his willingness to comply with whatever he required ; and to his subjects his miserable condition, and their own danger of being given up as a province to England. The regent called an assembly of the states ; in which the treaty was unanimously rejected, as being of such a nature as John could not conclude, nor they confirm.

It has been reported by Knighton, an old English author, that some of John's letters to his friends in France were intercepted at this time, which gave Edward a suspicion of his duplicity. It is certain, that he was, beyond all measure, enraged at the unanimity of the states in rejecting the treaty ; and he ordered John, and his son Philip, afterwards called the Hardy, duke of Burgundy, to be closely confined within the castle of Somerton. To add to his resentment, the French had employed the time spent on negotiating, in raising a powerful marine, which lay ready for invading England ; so that Edward was, in a manner, compelled to continue the truce to Midsummer ; but, in the mean time, fury was boiling in his breast, and he had resolved upon a deep and ample revenge.

The truce continued. The reader is not to imagine that, though we have confined the narrative of the French warlike operations chiefly to Paris and its neighbourhood, that therefore the rest of France enjoyed tranquility ; for all its provinces were full of wars, tumults, and insurrections, though the particulars are too minute for this history. Upon the retreat of Philip of Navarre to Normandy, many of the Navarrese garrisons in that province had declared for the English ; and Sir Robert Knolles, a celebrated English general, carried fire and sword into Berry. It is true that Edward did not countenance those and other hostilities committed by his subjects in the pay of his French allies ; but no sooner was the treaty of of London rejected, than he both approved of, and rewarded, what they had done ; for he assigned over to them, by way of free-hold, all the places that they had purchased in France by their swords.

Never had such preparations been seen in England as Edward made on this occasion. The truce had only encouraged the disbanded soldiers, who are sometimes called companions, and sometimes late comers, to remain in France ; where, under pretence of entering into the service of those powers who were not comprehended in the truce, they had filled the kingdom with blood-shed and rapine, to the great diminution of the royal authority.

The regent continued to behave with amazing steadiness, Edward and detached the count of Flanders from Edward's interest so effectually, that all the English in that county were expelled, France imprisoned, or put to death. Edward was so passionately with a set upon the execution of the late treaty, that, as his last vast army, tentative, he sent a message to the regent ; and threatened, if it was not fulfilled, to appear before the gates of Paris at the head of an hundred thousand men. This menace was treated with silent disregard ; upon which, all the military force of England attended Edward to Calais, where he landed on the twenty-eighth of October. He was there joined by the duke of Lancaster, whom he had sent over before him, and who had begun hostilities ; so that Edward, when he mustered his subjects and allies, found himself at the head of an hundred thousand fighting men, commanded, under himself, by his four sons and the chief nobility of England, all of them heroes, and some of them the best generals in Europe. In a council of war it was resolved, considering the too far advanced season of the year, to march directly to Paris, without suffering themselves to be amused by besieging any town whatever.

This mighty body accordingly began its march, in three which be- divisions, provided with all kind of carriages for conveyance ; gins its and provisions for subsistence. Notwithstanding the precau- march for tions taken by Edward, the depth of the roads, the rainy Paris, but season, and, above all, the enemy's parties, which skirted he is baf- his army, rendered his march slow and difficult. He was, fled before however, cheerfully obeyed by his subjects, who hoped to Rheims. be indemnified for all their labours by the plunder of France and its capital. Edward, instead of abiding by his wise resolution of proceeding directly to Paris, as he was passing by Rheims, unaccountably resolved to be crowned in that city. It was defended by its archbishop, the count of Porcien, and other French noblemen, who refused to open its gates at Edward's summons ; upon which he most absurdly besieged the city. As it was well provided, and made a noble resistance, the investing it introduced so many various operations against other places, that Edward, at last, totally deviated from his plan of procedure. His officers were, indeed, successful successful against some petty places ; but the siege of Rheims, at that time of the year, proved to be an immense undertaking ; and Edward, after spending two months upon it, was obliged (we may say ingloriously) to abandon it.

The regent persevered in his cool plan of remaining on the defensive, being sensible of the folly of opposing Edward in the field ; but, at the same time, his fleet sailed from the ports of Normandy with twenty thousand men, under the command of the count of St. Paul, and landed in some ports of Sussex, where they were guilty of many wanton barbarities ; but a squadron fitted out by the Londoners soon obliged them to return, with vast loss, to their harbours, where they were blocked up by the English. Edward, by this time, after losing a vast number of men, was marching towards Paris, through the most fertile provinces of France ; and, on the last day of March, he encamped, at Bourg la Reine, within two leagues of that capital. He had, indeed, been indemnified by the plunder he made, for the subsistence of his army ; but every other consideration was against him, excepting a secret correspondence he had renewed with the king of Navarre ; who, from a mere levity of disposition, and hatred to the Valois family, shut himself up in Mante, and declared against the regent.

appears before Pa- ris,

Edward soon found that he had committed the very mistakes his son had fallen into before the battle of Poitiers, but to a much greater degree, and with more apparent fatal consequences. By laying waste the country, he could not procure subsistence for his troops. He had tarnished his former glory by his not being able, during his march, to make himself master of one place of importance, though he was now lying before a city far greater, and better provided, than that which had baffled the utmost efforts of his arms. All this was represented to Edward, with great freedom, by the duke of Lancaster ; who represented likewise to him his danger of forfeiting the reputation he had acquired among his English subjects, and of their stopping his supplies in parliament. Edward said he was willing to enter upon a negotiation, but refused to depart from any article stipulated by the treaty of London. He drew out his army ; he braved the regent to battle ; and he made repeated attacks upon the city ; but all to no purpose ; for the regent continued within the walls, as he well knew that Edward must, in a few days, draw off his army for want of subsistence, which accordingly happened.

The treaty of Br- signi concluded.

The regent persisting in his conduct, notwithstanding several advantages he had gained, still confined his men within the walls of Paris ; but, upon Edward's departure, and threatening to renew his visit in autumn, he sent the bishop of Terouenne, the abbot of Clugny, with Simon de Langres, to offer him reasonable terms. By this, the regent was in hopes of stopping Edward in the resolution he had formed of laying laying all the country desolate till he came into Normandy; from whence he resolved to fall into Bretagne, and there to establish the Montfort family, but with destruction to all who opposed him. Upon the arrival of the French commissioners, the duke of Lancaster prevailed with Edward to see them; but his pride would not suffer him to agree to any terms but his own. Continuing his march, when he was within two leagues of Chartres, a most dreadful storm fell, which killed six thousand of his horses, and a thousand of his men, some of them of quality. Edward threw himself on his knees, and, extending his hands to the chapel of the Virgin, at Chartres, he vowed that he would give France a peace if he might obtain good conditions. The treaty was accordingly resumed at a village called Bretigni, the prince of Wales being the head commissioner for Edward. Those for France had been appointed by John; and were, the bishop of Beauvais; the chancellor, Charles, lord Montmorenci; lord John de Meingre, marshal of France; M. Aynart de la Tour, lord of Vivoy; M. Ralph de Ravenul; M. Simon de Bucey; M. Stephen de Paris, and Peter de la Charite, with many others of his council.

I have given an account of the storm preceding this treaty as I find it related by unquestionable contemporary writers; but I am far from imagining, with them, that it determined Edward to give peace to France. His army and affairs were then in such a situation, that no immediate intimation from heaven was necessary for determining his resolution in that point. At the same time, we are of opinion that Edward laid hold of the circumstance of the storm, to serve as an apology for having abated in his demands. He saw all John's subjects united against him, and that their detestation of him encreased in proportion to his devastations. He could have no dependance on the king of Navarre, whom he, in fact, considered as his rival. After the repulses he had met with at Rheims and Paris, he had no hopes of being able to keep his army, especially his foreign mercenaries, together; and he knew that his English parliament could never be brought to renew their subsidies for carrying on the war in France. Edward, therefore, exclusive of the storm, had many motives to agree to the peace of Bretigni; which was to him both honourable and advantageous.

The treaty, after the most important points were settled, took up eight days before it was reduced to form; and it is one of the fullest, and best digested, instruments we have upon record; though the negotiations had few or no precedents to follow. By it (to omit more minute particulars) Edward acquired, in full sovereignty, that is, without being obliged to do homage, Poitou, Saintogne, Agenois, Perigord, Limousin, Quercy, Angomois, Rouvergne, and all that he had possessed himself of in the neighbourhood of Calais. Edward, on the other hand, renounced all his family claims, not only to the crown of France, but to Normandy, Touraine, and Anjou; and was to receive. for the ransom of John and the French lords, three millions of crowns of gold; amounting to about seven hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling. Six hundred thousand crowns being to be paid within four months; and John's two sons, the counts of Adjou and Poitiers, his brother, the duke of Orleans, with the flower of the French nobility, were to be hostages for the performance. The great towns of France were likewise to give other hostages. The earldom of Montfort was to revert to that count; and the two kings were to adjust the dispute between his family and that of Blois.
H 4 and

The regent of France, notwithstanding the vast cessions made by this treaty, swore to the performance of it on his part, as did the prince of Wales; and a truce was concluded till it could be ratified by both kings at Calais: upon which Edward returned to England; where he landed on the eighteenth of May, 1360. When Edward laid before John the treaty of Bretigni, he appeared so highly delighted, that he said he was sorry he could not immediately ratify it; and the remainder of his abode in England was spent in royal entertainments; and in his being introduced, by the prince of Wales, to the English court at Windsor.

It is ratified.

Upon the arrival of the two kings at Calais, the French finances were found to be so much exhausted, that the six hundred thousand crowns could not be raised; and John was obliged to remain there for four months: after which time, four hundred thousand crowns were paid, and security was taken for the payment of the other two hundred thousand at Lady-day ensuing. The treaty of Bretigni was then ratified by both kings in the most solemn manner.

As peace was the business of the time, prince Philip of Navarre appeared on the part of the king his brother; as the duke of Orleans did for king John; and both of them swore to a sincere reconciliation between their principals.

John had been so long a captive, that he was overjoyed with his freedom, and was well disposed to have executed his part of the treaty; and when at perfect liberty, he confirmed it; though the mutual renunciations of Edward's claims and John's homages were never precisely understood or executed. Upon the whole, neither party were fully contented with the treaty even after it was executed. Edward was dissatisfied with himself at his giving up his claim to the crown of France, and the regent-dauphin at the vast cessions that had been made to Edward. Both parties were backward in pressing for the respective renunciations, and they lay, for some time, dormant; but it is certain that the regent-dauphin acted upon the soundest principles.

State of France at that time. Upon the return of John to Paris, the peers and states of France swore to the observance of the treaty of Bretigni; and the affections of the people for his person and government ment seemed to have been heightened by the misfortunes he had suffered. He had now leisure to deliberate on the good of his kingdom, which was afflicted with two calamities: the one was the want of money; and the other, the prodigious encrease of the disbanded soldiers, by the treaty of Bretigni, who seemed to be independent of all parties, and resolved to cut out for themselves a livelihood by their swords.

In the same treaty, the artful regent had left the time of the renuntiation of the sovereignty of the places ceded to Edward undetermined; and, when John demanded possession of the places ceded in Aquitain, the counts of Armagnac, Perigord, Foix, and others, refused to submit to his sovereignty; as did Rochelle, and several other sea towns on the coast of Poitou. John sent the lord James Bourbon, as Edward did a civilian, to persuade them to submit; and promised, at the same time, to ratify all renunciations of his claims upon the crown of France. Though the court of France might have made many objections, yet Edward, before the end of the year, obtained possession of the dutchy of Aquitain, from the Loire to the Pyrenean mountains; and of the earldom of Ponthieu, the town of Calais, the territory and town of Guifnes, with several other places and states; the lord John Chandois being appointed Edward's governor of Aquitain.

France, at this time, was no sooner delivered from the miseries of the English war, than she was depopulated by a raging plague; which co-operated with the disbanded soldiers, or, as they were called, late-comers, in laying waste the finest provinces of the kingdom. The late treaty had been too hastily concluded; nor had Edward properly considered the situation of his subjects, to whom he had assigned free-holds within the estates that had been ceded to France. They had built houses, and improved their estates, out of which they were turned by the treaty; so that they had no means of living but by the sword. They were in number about sixteen thousand men; and they formed themselves into a regular army, pretending to act under the king of Navarre's authority.

As all of them were soldiers, they were an over-match for The late? the troops sent against them under lord James of Bourbon; comers who, as well as his son, was mortally wounded and defeated defeat and in fighting against them. The insurgents afterwards grow- kill James ing more numerous, separated into two divisions; but, tho' of Bour- they were the authors of prodigious calamities to France, bon. their history, after this, belongs to that of other nations.

An unaccountable incident happened about this time: One Gouge, a Frenchman, confederated with one Verney, an Englishman; and they obtained such credit with the late-comers, that Gouge was proclaimed king of France, and Verney

Verney became master of Codelet, near Avignon; but both of them, after a short reign, were defeated.

The young duke of Burgundy, who had been betrothed to the daughter of the earl of Flanders, died about this time. Edward of England wanted to marry the widowed virgin to his fifth son, Edmund; but the king of France seized the dutchy, as being next heir to the deceased; though, when the laws of succession are considered, the king of Navarre had certainly a preferable right to the counties of Champagne and Brie. John de Boulogne, the late duke's uncle by the mother's side, claimed the counties of Boulogne and Auvergne, as the count of Flanders did Burgundy and Artois.

The kingdom of France, at this time, had, by the wars that prevailed in Italy, got rid of the late-comers; but not without feeling the prodigious ravages committed by them; part of whom were taken into the pay of the marquis of Montferrat, at the request of the pope, who was afraid of their plundering his residence at Avignon. The treaty of Bretigni still remained unfinished. The feast of St. Andrew, in 1361, was at hand; and no dispositions on either side were made for its execution. Edward complained of this, and of other infractions of the treaty; but, in the mean while, his son, the prince of Wales, to whom he had assigned the dutchy of Guienne, was preparing to live there in full splendor and sovereignty; which the French court complained of, because Edward had not yet made the renunciations stipulated by the treaty.

The French king demanded, that, by virtue of that treaty, Edward should renounce his alliance with the Flemings; but Edward answered, by requiring John to renounce his alliance with the Scots. John found his authority so much diminished, and his difficulties, among his own subjects, so greatly encreased, that he wished to be again a prisoner in England. The dauphin had got a taste of power, understood the constitution of France, and insisted upon his father agreeing to nothing that might be prejudicial to his succession.

John gives the dutchy of Burgundy to his youngest son. As John was now passionately fond of peace, he resolved to consult with his friend, pope Innocent VI. who resided at Avignon, and he paid him a visit; but, in the mean while, by virtue of his own prerogative, without regarding either Edward's or the king of Navarre's claims, he bestowed the dutchy of Burgundy upon his son Philip; but, to do John justice, he did that at the request of the Burgundians themselves; who, when he was upon his journey to Avignon, applied to him, and insisted upon their being governed by a prince of the French blood. John, it is true, had, before that time, annexed the dutchy of Burgundy to the crown of France; but, upon the application of the Burgundians, he transferred it to his son Philip; to whom, in his grant, he gave the most unbounded praises; declaring him, at the same time, time, to be the first peer in France. Philip confirmed his title to Burgundy by marrying the last duke's widow.

Urban V. had now succeeded to the papacy; and, upon the application of the king of Cyprus for aid against the infidels, he persuaded John to take upon him the cross. This was a foolish and impracticable resolution; but John, like his predecessors, was superstitious; for he imagined that their chief misfortunes had befallen them because they had not fulfilled their vows. To give some colourable pretence for this absurd engagement, he pretended he had undertaken it in order to prevail upon the free-booters, or late-comers, to attend him to the Holy Land.

No sooner was John's resolution known, and that the pope had declared him generalissimo of the Christian armies, than the king of Navarre renewed his intrigues for Burgundy; of which he thought, with reason, he had been unfairly deprived. Upon John's return to Paris, he found that the spirit of discontent had entered, and indeed with great cause, into the hostages he had sent to Calais. No time had been stipulated for their release; and the duke of Anjou was so impatient of his confinement, that he broke out of it, and went to Paris. The French parliament and the dauphin refused to ratify the treaty of Bretigni in all its articles. The maxim of John was, that, if truth and honour were disclaimed by all the world, they ought to be found in the breast of a king. In consequence of this maxim, he ordered his son to return to his captivity, but the young prince declining it, John himself went over to England, to make his apology, some time before Christmas, 1363.

turns to England.

John had many rational motives for this step, romantic as it appeared. He had a vast personal interest at the English court; he was in hopes, as he was then a soldier of Jesus Christ, to prevail with Edward to remit the hard terms of his ransom; and to convince him, that it was utterly impossible for his subjects, in their ruined situation, to fulfil them. He found Edward dreadfully exasperated at the duke of Anjou having broke his word of honour, and at the non-execution of the treaty of Bretigni; so that, though John offered him part of his ransom in ready-money, he refused to accept of it, or give the other hostages their freedom, as John had expected.

Notwithstanding this, Edward, though he considered John where he as no better than a prisoner, treated him with the highest marks of respect; lodged him in the Savoy, at that time one of the most magnificent palaces in England; and indulged him in his darling passion for hunting; but still declined to give him any satisfaction as to the main parts of his negotiation. John's spirit could not bear this state of doubt, and he fell ill of a consumptive disorder, which put an end to his life, in his residence at the Savoy, on the eighth of April, 1364, 1364, in the fifty-sixth year of his age, and the fourteenth of his reign.

His character,

This monarch, though subject to many frailties, especially those of temerity and passion, most certainly deserved a better fate than he experienced. His subjects did not deserve to be governed by such a sovereign; and they were less sensible of his worth and virtues than his enemies the English were, who most sincerely bewailed his death. Edward attended his funeral rites, and afterwards sent his corps to be interred in France. He obtained the epithet of the Good, on account of his personal candour and openness; but he fell into most degenerate times. His detestation of profligacy induced him sometimes to indulge his natural harshness by too great severity of punishment; but that he was not cruel, appears by many incidents of his reign. After being delivered from his captivity by the treaty of Bretigni, he certainly ought to have applied himself to the discharge of his engagements with Edward, who appears to have insisted with an ungenerous punctuality, upon his fulfilling the terms of his ransom.

His first wife was Bona of Luxembourg, daughter to the king of Bohemia, and sister to the emperor Charles IV. but she died before his accession to the crown. By her he had Charles the dauphin regent, whom we have so often mentioned; Lewis duke of Anjou; John duke of Berry, and Philip duke of Burgundy. By the same princess he had five daughters, Joan, who was married to the king of Navarre; Mary, wife to Robert duke of Bar; Agnes, who died in her childhood; Margaret, who was a nun; and Isabel, the wife of John Galeazzo, duke of Milan. His second wife, Joan, dutchess dowager of Burgundy, was a celebrated beauty; and John by her had two daughters, who died young. It is commonly said, that he was of an amorous complexion, and that he would have married Joan, the famous queen of Naples, had it not been for the notoriously bad character she bore. It was thought that his last return to England was owing to a love intrigue, which he carried on while he was a captive.

Charles V. surnamed the Wise.

Affairs of Bretagne.

THE credit of the French monarchy was very low when this prince came to the throne. The king of Navarre was in arms, and had under him the famous captal of Buche, one of Edward's best generals, and who had been highly instrumental in gaining the victory of Poitiers. Bertrand de Guesclin, was Charles's general, and distinguished himself by his military genius. He defeated the captal in several encounters, and at last a decisive battle was fought between them near Cocherel, in which Guesclin, was victorious, vious, and the captal made a prisoner. Mante and Meulan, in Normandy, fell into Guesclin's hands. The king of Navarre's brother, Philip, died, and another of his brothers Lewis de Evreux, after losing the town of la Charite, was obliged to evacuate Burgundy. Charles, by his ministers, complained heavily of Edward's duplicity, in suffering his officers and soldiers to serve under commissions from the enemies of the crown of France; and it must be allowed that Edward's conduct in this was indefensible, and can only be alleviated by the consideration that Charles gave the like assistance to the enemies of England.

Whatever respite, truces, or treaties brought to the two crowns, the unhappy dutchy of Bretagne knew none between the contending houses of Montfort and Blois; and the dispute was fomented by the kings of France and England. Some overtures of peace had indeed been made, and had proceeded so far that it was agreed Rennes and Nantes should belong to Charles of Blois. The countess of Penthievre, wife of Charles of Blois, and in whose right he claimed Bretagne, opposed the opartition, and the project came to nothing. The prince of Wales, who now acted with full sovereignty in all his father's French dominions, made a fresh tentative, but in vain, for reconciling the rival families. The last appeal was then made to the sword. The English troops in the Navarese pay, were by Edward and his son ordered to join Montfort, under the lord John Chandois, and Guesclin marched to the assistance of de Blois, with all the troops he could collect in the Lower Normandy. Montfort had by this time formed the siege of Aurai, a place of importance, within three leagues of Vannes, and had taken the town, when Charles de Blois marched with his army to relieve the castle. This brought on a battle, in which de Blois was defeated and killed, and Guesclin taken prisoner, chiefly through the valour and good conduct of the lord Chandois, the English general. After this battle, the castle of Aurai, and the city of Vannes, with many other places in Bretagne, were surrendered to Montfort, and numbers of the Breton nobility abandoned the interest of the Blois family.

The reverses of fortune made but little impression on Bretagne Charles the Wise. He continued, in his calm steady manner, to support the countess of Penthievre, but at the same time ordered some overtures of an accommodation to be made to the count of Montfort, who was then besieging Quimper-correntin. Montfort declared that he could return no answer without consulting Edward, who left the matter entirely to himself, but insisted upon his being put in possession of the whole dutchy of Bretagne without any diminution. Montfort upon this, could only be brought to offer to hold the dutchy of Bretagne in homage to the crown of France; a concession, which was thought so important at the court of court of France, that the conferences for an accommodation were renewed, and at last it was completed. Its chief articles were as follow :

“ That John, count of Montfort, should be acknowledged as lawful and sole duke of Bretagne. That the countess of Penthievre, shall, for herself and her heirs, renounce all pretensions to the same ; and agree that the count of Montfort should perform his homage for the said dutchy to the crown of France. That the county of Penthievre should remain to the countess, with all the lands of Bretagne which came by her father or mother ; as also ten thousand crowns a year to be paid out of the estates of the Montfort family in France. That the count of Montfort should use his most earnest instances to procure the liberty of John of Bretagne, the countess of Penthievre’s eldest son, who had been long as a hostage for his father in England ; and that the said young prince should be married to Jane, the count of Montfort’s sister, who was to have the viscounty of Limoges as her fortune. That the said young prince, John of Bretagne, should succeed to that dutchy, in case the count of Montfort should die without male issue.”

Equani-

Charles.

A treaty of marriage was, at this time, on foot, between the earl of Cambridge, Edward’s fifth son, and the lady Margaret, daughter to the count of Flanders, who was then in England. Charles thought it was of the utmost importance for him to prevent this match from taking place ; and a dispensation being necessary, he managed so artfully with the pope, that it never was obtained, and the lady was given to his brother the duke of Burgundy. The court of France, notwithstanding it had failed in supporting the house of Blois, was now emerged from that disgrace which it had lain under in the late reign. The duke of Bretagne, of the Montfort family, paid homage to Charles, who seemed to receive him with great politeness and affection. Guesclin was set at liberty, and the duke likewise confirmed to him all the grants made in his favour by his rival Charles de Blois. The dutchess of Bretagne, daughter to Edward III. happening to die about this time, the duke married the daughter of the princess of Wales by a former husband, against the inclinations of Charles, who, notwithstanding, preserved a wonderful equanimity. So far was he from expressing any resentment for what had past with regard to Bretagne, that he took into his service the captal of Buche, from the high opinion he had of his merit and fidelity to Edward, and though a prisoner, released him without ransom. The captal waited upon the prince of Wales at Bordeaux, to acquaint him with the change of his situation, but the prince told him that he must serve either his father or Charles, upon which the captal returned to Charles a grant he had made to him of the county of Nemours, and returned to Edward’s service.

The

The kingdom of France beginning to enjoy a respite State of from war, Charles examined the state of his finances, which the French he found to be in a miserable condition. The grants that finances. during the late reign had been made to the princes of the blood, had exhausted the royal demesnes, and Charles signified to his uncle the duke of Orleans, that he intended to resume some part of the great estate that had been given him by his brother the late king. This intention being signified to the duke, he in full parliament offered to resign the whole of what he held, into the king's hands, a proceeding which appeared so generous in the eyes of Charles, that he confirmed the duke in all he possessed. Well knowing that the industry of the subject is the best revenue of the king, he now applied himself incessantly to the revival of agriculture, and manufactures, and both by his example and edicts he put a stop to all kinds of luxury, especially in equipages and cloaths. While he was thus intent upon cares that were worthy a king, his kingdom was revisited by the dreadful scourges of disbanded troops. This was an evil that Edward had not sufficiently considered or provided against by the treaty of Bretagne, and the court of France had been guilty of the same oversight. The case of Original the soldiers and their officers was certainly deplorable. of the Both kings had been so miserably distressed for money, that freeboot- they had paid their men by assigning them lands in their ing com- conquered countries, which now reverted to their former panies. owners, and consequently those assignments were void, and the poor people rendered destitute. They had no resource but that of keeping themselves in bodies under officers of their own chusing, and laying the country every where under contribution. All those bodies had a dependence upon each other, and taking the name of grand companies they became very formidable to the crown of France. They ravaged the counties of Champagne and Burgundy, but one party of them was so just as to put to death one of its leaders who had made an inhuman use of his power.

Charles saw with grief and indignation the progress of France those necessitated robbers. As they were far better soldiers delivered than any he could raise, he could not subdue them, nor from them had he money to raise or pay an army. He complained to by Gues- Edward, who ordered such of them as were his subjects clin. to lay down their arms, and upon their not obeying he raised an army and prepared to pass over to France to force them. Charles thought that Edward's return to France at the head of an army might be a greater misfortune than any he suffered, and begged him to desist, which Edward agreed to do, but he swore at the same time, that if the companies, or as they were some times called, the malandrines, should drive him from the throne of France, he would give Charles no assistance. While Charles was in this distress, the famous Bertrand de Guesclin offered his service service to relieve him. Charles accepted of it, and Guesclin had an interview with some of the heads of the companies, who had been formerly his friends and associates in arms. It was no hard matter for Guesclin to perceive that necessity alone kept the companies together, and that they would embrace any opportunity of a more honourable way of life. Guesclin proposed that they should march against the Moors and infidels in Spain, to which they agreed, and thirty-five of their principal officers accepted of an invitation given them by Charles, and went to Paris, where they were magnificently entertained, and received from him two hundred thousand franks towards the expences of their march. Chalons upon the Soame was fixed upon as the place of their rendezvous, and Guesclin undertook to head them in person.

He carries

Spain.

Though the proposal of the companies marching against the Moors in Spain was plausible, yet it was not the measure that either Charles or Guesclin had in view. Peter the Cruel, an epithet he well deserved, then reigned in Castile. He had married Blanch de Bourbon, one of the most accomplished ladies in Europe, and sister to the queen of France, but he had used her most unmercifully, and even imprisoned her, that he might gratify a passion he had for his mistress Maria de Padilla. Proceeding from one degree of wickedness to another, he at last poisoned his queen, and began to put the princes of his own blood to death, when one of his natural brothers, Henry de Transjamar, put himself at the head of a party who detested the king's tyranny. He was supported by the king of Arragon, but being defeated by Peter, he was forced to take refuge in France, where Charles entered heartily into his interest, and espoused the design of dethroning the tyrant.

Some writers, from an affectation of singularity, have represented the cruelties of Pedro as the effects of political necessity; but they seem to have resulted from his innate sanguinary disposition. He had, against the public faith, put to death Eleanora Delynsman, his father's mistress, who had borne him seven sons. He ordered his brother don Frederic to be butchered in his presence, and he dined in the room where the murder was committed, without removing the body. He had before that murdered Garcilasso de Vega, and his cousin don Juan of Arragon, whose widow he poisoned, and he put his own aunt, the queen dowager of Arragon, to death. In short, no tyrant of antiquity exceeded him in cruelty; but we shall refer other particulars to the history of Spain.

Pedro. Guesclin, in this expedition, served under John of Bourbon, who had the nominal command, and the king of Arragon giving the companies a free passage through his dominions, all Pedro's subjects, one nobleman excepted, forsook him, while Henry was in Burgos proclaimed king of Castile. The tyrant at this time was shut up in Gorruna, from whence he implored the assistance of Edward, and his son the prince of Wales. Edward was in no good understanding with the pope, who, as well as Charles, had embraced the count of Transtamar's party, nor did he chuse that Charles should establish a king upon the throne of Castile. Pedro had the undoubted right of blood, and pleaded many alleviations for his cruelties, particularly the excessive power of his natural brethren, who had been always rebellious and wanted to dethrone him. Edward gave him a favourable hearing, and the prince of Wales, pleased with the prospect of again shining in arms, invited Pedro with his family, first to Bayonne, and then to his court at Bordeaux. An attempt to restore Pedro to his throne was too difficult and important a matter for the prince not to consult his father, especially as several great men in his own court opposed it; but upon the return of a messenger from England, he declared his resolution to proceed in the expedition against the count of Transtamar.

The prince calling a council, agreed to pay twenty thousand florins for a free passage by the way of the Pyrenean mountains; because the king of Arragon had shut up all the other avenues to Castile. Pedro, at the same time, granted to the prince and his heirs, the province of Biscay in full sovereignty, together with several castles and other distinguished honours to the royal family of England. Guesclin having established, as he thought, Henry, on the throne of Castile, had returned to France; and Henry, upon this, had dismissed the companies; who left his service in great discontent. They had been promised by the pope, a considerable sum of money, of which they were disappointed; and Knolles, Calverley, and Gournay, who were at their head, readily embraced the proposal made them by the prince of Wales of entering into his service. The prince thus procured the face of an army composed of soldiers whom he knew he could depend on; but when they had advanced as far as Montauban to join him, they were opposed by the count of Narbonne, and the seneschal of Tholouse, who were defeated with considerable slaughter. The year was now too far gone for him to think of proceeding in his expedition till the approaching spring; and thus the prince had the double expence of keeping the companies in his pay, and of maintaining Pedro's court at Bayonne.

About the beginning of the year 1367, the prince ordered the rendezvous of his army to be held at Dax in Gascony; but found that a treaty was far advanced between count Henry and the king of Navarre, for barring up his passage into Castile. Perhaps, nothing but the activity of Sir Hugh Calverley, who had seized several places belonging to that prince, could have prevented this negotiation from taking place; but the king was so much alarmed by what Calverley had done, that in a meeting he had with the duke of Lancaster and the lord Chandois, he cordially agreed to every thing proposed by the prince.

The treaty of
broken,

The glory which the prince gained by defeating count Henry in the battle of Navarette, and his making Guesclin prisoner, will be shewn in the history of Spain. The prince, before that battle, had written the most polite letters to Henry, to persuade him to yield the crown of Castile to its true owner don Pedro; but he was answered with a negative, and an assurance from Henry, that he would not resign his crown but with his life. Henry, losing the battle fled to Arragon, and Guesclin surrendered himself prisoner to the prince of Wales, as did many other officers of great distinction both French and Spanish. Pedro shewed himself unworthy of his good fortune, by refusing to give the companies the pay he had stipulated. The diseases of the season, and the climate, had killed one third of the prince's army, and the king of Navarre, as was generally thought, had suffered himself to be taken prisoner by the French that he might avoid fulfilling his engagement with the English. The prince pressed Pedro for the payment of his arrears, which he promised to discharge in twelve months, provided he would evacuate his dominions; which the prince was obliged to do. Before his departure, he suffered all his French and Spanish prisoners to be ransomed at an easy rate, excepting Guesclin, who was highly carressed by the English officers, and was distinguished by a compliment from the prince, that he was too brave, and therefore too dangerous, an enemy, to be set at liberty. As to count Henry, he took refuge with the duke of Anjou, whom he knew to be an inveterate enemy to the English, and who being governor of Languedoc, resided near the prince of Wales's French possessions. Assembling some Bretons, he invaded Guienne, which the prince of Wales complained of as a breach of the treaty of Bretigni. Charles sincerely desired peace, but was not displeased at the English being embarrassed, and for some time winked at the duke of Anjou's protecting the count, till hearing that the prince of Wales was in full march homewards, he ordered the count of Auxerre, who was raising troops for count Henry's service, to be put under arrest. This did not deter count Henry from renewing his inroads into Guienne, which however, he was soon obliged to abandon, that he might make another attempt to mount the throne of Castile. He was received with open arms by the king of Arragon, and Pedro was now as much detested for his ingratitude to the prince, as he had been before for his cruelty. Upon the prince's return to Guienne, he saw his coffers empty, and he was without the means of discharging the arrears that were due to the companies, who were still on foot, but grew so outrageous for their pay, that they laid the prince's own subjects under military contribution,

tribution; and the great lords of Guienne, and the other fiefs belonging to the prince, being apprehensive that he would be obliged to exact of them some extra feudal imposts, secretly applied to Charles, between whom and Edward the necessary renuntiations required by the treaty of Bretigni had never yet passed.

Charles knew that the expence of the prince of Wales's Necessity-court was above what his revenues, great as they were, could supply; but he acted so as to give the prince no cause of complaint. It was not long before what the prince's great lords apprehended proved true. Though the leaders of the companies had prevailed upon their followers to withdraw out of the prince's territories, yet they could not subsist without robbing the subjects of Charles, who sent Oliver de Clifton with a body of troops to protect them. In the mean while, the prince's necessities grew so clamorous, that, by the advice of his chancellor the bishop of Rodez, he called an assembly of the states of Aquitain, from whom he demanded a tax called a feuage, consisting of a franc upon each chimney within the principality, and to be continued for five years. The deputies of the towns willingly agreed to pay it, but the great feudatories, who were the count of Armagnac, the lord of Albretti, the lords of Perigord, Conde, Cominge, Carmain, de la Barde, and others, opposed it, as being extra-feudal, and against their privileges which the prince had sworn to maintain. There is some reason for imagining that the prince's demand had been suggested to him by his French ministers, in order to ruin his interest in Aquitain. His lords desired leave for time to consult their tenants about raising the tax; but having procured it they left Niort, where the assembly was held, and repaired immediately to the court of France; where they entered an appeal to Charles, as lord of the fee, against the proceedings of the prince of Wales.

This was what Charles had long foreseen, and secretly wished for; and the lord Chandois, with the rest of the prince's honest English ministers, were so far from approving of the taxation, that they left his court. The reason why Charles had so artfully put off the renuntiations was now evident to the prince, and must be so to our readers; because, if they had been executed, the Aquitain lords could have no pretext for applying to him as their lord paramount. He affected, however, great coolness towards their suit; he then promised to revise the treaty of Bretigni, and seemed to lament that the prince of Wales had been so inconsiderate as to invade their privileges. The prince all this while was pushed on by his French counsellors to his ruin. He levied the tax, though it was directly against the privileges of his feudatories. Guesclin was still his prisoner, and he took occasion one day to hint to the prince, that his fate was hard, to be detained a captive because he was feared: The prince considered this as a tacit reproach upon himself, and knowing Guesclin to be poor, because he had been always generous, he hastily told him, that he might have his liberty if he could procure him two hundred thousand florins for his ransom. Guesclin took the prince at his word; and so popular was he in France, that, to the surprize and disappointment of the prince, he paid the money at Bordeaux on the day appointed, and once more took arms under the count of Transtamar, who had renewed the war against Pedro.

Appeal of the Gascon barons. The appeal of the Aquitain, or Gascon, lords, was still pending at the court of France, and Charles appeared still to be backward to receive it, while the duke of Berry, and the count of St. Paul remained hostages in England, which was not long, as both of them found means to come over to France in the beginning of the summer of 1368. Charles then ordered the treaty of Bretigni to be thoroughly examined in his council, where it was declared to be void and of no effect; first, because Edward had not joined the French king in suppressing the companies or malandrines; and secondly, because he had not performed the necessary renuntiations. Notwithstanding this, Charles still avoided coming to any extremity by summoning the prince of Wales to appear before his parliament at Paris, before he formed new alliances with the count of Transtamar, who was now king of Castile, the earl of Flanders, and some of the German princes, besides entering into secret correspondencies with several of the prince's towns in Aquitain. He then regularly summoned the prince to appear before his chamber of peers at Paris, to answer to the complaint of his subjects of Aquitain.

The prince summoned to appear at Paris.

Charles now foresaw that a war with England was inevitable. The treaty which had been concluded between him and the new king of Castile, had in it the following remarkable clause, "That if any of the blood royal of England, or if king Peter should fall into the hands of the admirals of the two nations, as they were sailing in company, that the said captive or captives should be detained prisoners, and not released but by the joint consent of both powers." Charles, even after this treaty was formed, was, by his ministers at the court of England, making the most ample protestations of his friendship and pacific intentions towards Edward; but in the mean time, he not only continued to strengthen himself with German alliances, but took into his pay such of the companies, as still remained on foot. Edward, at last, was undeceived as to Charles's intentions, and offered to execute the necessary renuntiations; but was told that it was too late, because, by the many breaches he had made in the treaty of Bretigni, the sovereignty of Aquitain, and the other states ceded thereby to him, reverted to the crown of France. Edward then threatened to revive his claim claim upon that kingdom; but he was defired by Charles to do his worst.

In the beginning of the year 1369, and not before, the prince of Wales received his summons to appear at Paris; which he promised in a rage, to the messengers, to do at the head of sixty thousand men; but he was ill supported by his father, who was still in hopes to compromise matters by negotiation; and he was likewise without money, and almost without any friends but the lord Chandois, who had generously returned to his assistance in his distress, the capital of Buche, and one or two more of his military officers. Which he resents.

Charles, in the mean while, proceeded with the greatest deliberation and solemnity. It does not appear that he pretended the prince of Wales had forfeited his possession of the fief of Aquitain, unless his barons should make good their charge against him; and for that purpose Charles summoned an assembly of his states at Paris, before whom he laid all the complaints of the Aquitain lords against the prince, and likewise all that had passed between him and the court of England. The assembly appeared to be overjoyed at his proceeding, and his resolution of re-annexing Aquitain to his crown. They voted to stand by him with their lives and fortunes; and, in the mean while, assisted him with a large subsidy. His proceeding upon this occasion was the more popular, as he took no step without the consent and advice of his states, and relying on their promises, he immediately declared war against Edward. Caution of Charles.

The first hostility was committed by the earl of Perigord, in revenge of the prince of Wales having ordered the messengers, who summoned him, to be arrested; but all the prince could do was to reinforce the garrison of Montauban, and to stand upon the defensive till he could receive supplies from England. Before those could come, Charles had laid his schemes so well, that the town of Abbeville was surprized by the count of St. Paul, and all the county of Ponthieu, with the English chancery there, fell without the stroke of a sword into the hands of the French. Edward was defied by a common domestic of Charles, who pretended that the arrest of his messengers by the prince, excused him from sending one of higher quality; and by the advice of the English parliament Edward resumed the titles and arms of France, and received from them a great subsidy. Hostilities commenced.

It happened unfortunately for the English interest and glory, that the brave prince of Wales was at this time, languishing under a mortal disorder, and unable to mount his horse. The new king of Castile punctually performed his treaty with Charles, and the French and Castilian fleets joining, they made up a formidable armament. Both Edward and the prince of Wales had hitherto flattered themselves that they had interest enough to prevail with the companies to re-enter into their service; but they were deceived.

ceived. The duke of Berry over-ran the country of Poitou, as the duke of Anjou did Gascony, while the prince of Wales could do little more than be a silent spectator of their ravages. Edward, exasperated by those hostilities, thought at first of taking a bloody revenge upon the French hostages that were still in his hands; but a little reflection soon disarmed him of that thought. He had been so amused by the pacific declarations of Charles, that his marine was gone to decay, and the Castilian and French fleets were masters of the English channel; so that it was a matter of great danger and difficulty to send troops, who must land in the bay of Biscay, to the assistance of the prince of Wales. The duke of Bretagne consented that the earls of Cambridge, and Pembroke, whom Edward had appointed to command the English auxiliaries, should land at St. Maloes, and march through his territories, which they accordingly did, and joined the prince about the same time that he received reinforcements under Sir Hugh Calverley, and the lord Chandois.

The English interest there ruined.

The English interest in Aquitain was however, by this time, ruined. The important city of Cahors, by the preaching of the archbishop of Tholouse, had declared for the French, and all the inferior clergy declaimed from their pulpits against the English, who were, by the same archbishop, driven out of fifty towns in the neighbourhood of Cahors. The earl of Perigord took Roanville, and put its English garrison to the sword; and the duke of Berry met with no opposition in Auvergne, and Limosin. In Picardy, the French were repulsed from the siege of Andres in the neighbourhood of Calais; but the loss of la Roche de Pozay by the English, obliged the prince of Wales to weaken the garrison of Montauban, that he might strengthen that of Poitiers.

Writings on both sides.

Charles, all this while, affected to depend upon the justice of his cause, and employed the best pens in Europe, particularly two Boulognese divines, John de Lyana, and Richard de Salicette, to justify his title to the crown of France, and to answer all the allegations that had been published against his conduct on the part of Edward. Charles did not stop at writing, for he and his queen, and court, appeared every day publicly in the most extraordinary acts of devotion, imploring the divine assistance upon his arms; this had an incredible effect upon the minds of all his subjects; nor could all the valour of Chandois, Audley, Calverley, Knowles, and other brave English officers, compensate for the general defection of the French from the English interest.

Exploits of the English in France.

The lord of Chauvigny, having deserted to Charles, the lord Audley fell into his estates, and gave his tenants no quarter. He took Breufe, and put the garrison to the sword, while Sir Robert Knowles, who had been rewarded by a noble estate in Bretagne, for his service to the Montfort family, received a commission from the prince of Wales at Angoulesme, lesme, and reduced great part of the county of Perigord. The earls of Cambridge, and Pembroke, besieged and took Bourdeilles; and, by the command of the prince of Wales, the lord Chandois, and Sir Robert Knolles, having joined their forces, made an attempt upon Roche sur Yon. Some of the English companies had been prevailed upon to enter into the prince's service, and they had taken prisoner Isabella, mother to the queen of France, and the duke of Bourbon, in the castle of Belleperche, in the Bourbonnois. The place was soon after invested by the duke of Bourbon, and abandoned by the English garrison, who carried off with them the dutchess. The duke exclaimed against this proceeding, and the prince was forced to excuse it, not having sufficient authority over the companies to oblige them to set her at liberty. The castle of Roche sur Yon, was by this time taken, or bought, by the earl of Cambridge; for which the duke of Anjou ordered the governor to be sewed up in a sack and thrown into the sea. But all those petty advantages were of little or no service to the English, against the prevailing fortune of Charles.

His policy and deep laid schemes unfolded themselves Charles more and more every day; but his genius was entirely attempts confined to his own dominions, and to the dexterity with to invade which he united his subjects against the English. His fleet England, and that of Castile continued still in possession of the English channel; and repairing in person to Rouen, he ordered a great body of troops to be embarked from the coasts of Picardy, on pretence of an expedition to Portugal; but in reality to invade England. When he opened his true design to his council, the wisest heads endeavoured to dissuade him from his resolution, as his intention was no secret in England, where Edward was making prodigious preparations to receive his army; the duke of Burgundy having the command of the expedition. Edward's subjects were fired at the thoughts of a French invasion, and it is more than probable, that had the French made their descent, they must have been destroyed. It is certain, however, that part of their fleet landed and burnt Portsmouth; but the alacrity of the English soon took from Charles all thoughts of invading England.

A strong squadron was in a short time fitted out by Ed- Duke of ward, and the command of it was given to John of Ghent, Lancaster duke of Lancaster; but Charles no sooner heard of its being lands in at sea than he ordered his troops to be disembarked. The France. duke, attended by a gallant train of English noblemen, landed at Calais, when he took upon him the command of the English troops there, and in that neighbourhood.

Charles ordered the duke of Burgundy to oppose him with an army of observation, for he gave him the most positive orders not to hazard a battle; which the duke of Burgundy avoided in a most masterly manner. The duke of Lancaster, on the other hand, omitted nothing that could provoke him to fight, by penetrating into the country, and daily sending an immense quantity of plunder to Calais. The duke of Burgundy, at last, passed the Somme, and encamped at Monstreville, in a situation which could not be forced. He was followed by the English, who were far inferior to him in numbers; but the duke persisted in not fighting. The French nobility in his army were so much scandalized at his inactivity, that the duke wrote to his brother for leave to fight; but, instead of that, Charles ordered him to decamp; which he did with so much generalship, that the duke of Lancaster, perceiving himself to be outwitted, was forced to return to Calais; while the duke of Burgundy resigned the command of his army to the constable de Fiennes and the count of St. Paul. After this, the duke of Lancaster ravaged the country of Eu and de Caux, in order to cover a design he had formed of burning the French fleet in Harfleur: but this project was disappointed by its taking air, and the earl of St. Paul throwing himself, with some troops, into the place; upon which the duke of Lancaster put an end to the campaign in that quarter.

The lord
killed.

The lord Chandois was now seneschal of Aquitain, and proposed an irruption into the Anjouvine, in conjunction with the earl of Pembroke, who haughtily refused to serve under him; but no sooner was Chandois returned to Poitiers than the earl undertook the same expedition, and for some time proceeded without resistance. His success encreasing his security, he was surprized by a body of French troops under Robert de Sancere, in an open town called Fuernon, where all his men, but two hundred, were cut off, and he was on the point of being sacrificed, when Chandois hearing of his danger ran to his assistance, and bravely delivered him. The earl's danger taught him caution, and being joined by Sir Hugh Calverley, they made a second irruption into the Anjouvine, where they took and garrisoned two important places, Pont de Cè, and the abbey of St. Maur. The French, about the same time, took St. Salvinc, which lying within the government of the lord Chandois, he attempted to retake it, but his foot happening to slip in the attack, he was thrust into the brain and killed. His death was the greatest misfortune that could have happened to the English in France. He had educated the prince of Wales, and had taught him humanity as well as arms. His judgment in war was equal to his valour, and in peace his councils were always found to be wise and honest. But we are now to attend the court of France.

The duchy of Burgundy was still in dispute between the king of Navarre and that duke, who married the daughter of the count of Flanders. Charles had declared loudly in favour of his brother, and was now so popular, that the king of Navarre despairing to succeed in the way of negotiation, ation, renewed his engagements with Edward, to whom he paid a visit in England. Upon his return, the squadron which carried him was defeated by the French fleet; and tho' he had admitted English troops into his Norman garrisons, yet he was obliged to remain neutral for some time. Edward was, then, treating with the dukes of Fuliers and Gueldres, and other German princes, whom he brought over to his interest, and would have prevailed with several more, had not Charles augmented their subsidies, and prevailed with the seneschal of Hainault, to keep them firm in their alliance. Charles, imagined that by his brother's marriage with the princess of Flanders, his interest among the Flemings was not to be shaken; but he was deceived, and while he thought that Edward was taking the most effectual means of irreconcilably exasperating the Flemings, the event shewed that he was securing them in his party. Edward, instead of treating with them, or endeavouring to win them over, ordered all their ships to be seized by the English wherever they could be found; which intimidated the Flemings (who were great gainers by their trade with England, and had an affection for the English) so much, that they obliged their count, (or as he is now called duke) to consent to a suspension of arms; and upon Edward's again opening their intercourse with England, to enter into a treaty of neutrality between him and Charles.

Edward's interest in France continued still to decline, and in 1370, the lord of Pamiers, and some other persons of quality, were put to death for their correspondence with the French court. Edward's son-in-law, the lord de Coucy, whom Edward had created earl of Bedford, had a great estate in France, and to avoid a disagreeable situation between the two kings, he this year removed with his family to Italy. In May the court of France published its sentence of re-annexation of the duchy of Aquitain to the crown, for the reasons we have already specified, and it was followed by a solemn requisition of all the Aquitain lords to repair to court and do homage to Charles. Edward had long foreseen this blow, and gave commissions to Sir Robert Knolles, Sir Thomas Grandison, Sir Alan Buxhul, and other chiefs of the companies, to lay France waste, Sir Robert Knolles having the command. Their army, which was unprovided of every thing necessary for a siege, rendezvoused at Calais; from whence they marched towards Artois, but without seeing an enemy, (Charles having ordered his soldiers to confine themselves within the walls of their towns) or of having any other satisfaction than that of either destroying an open defenceless county, or of raising contributions upon its inhabitants. Without entering into more disagreeable particulars, Knolles continued his ravages to the gates of Paris, where Charles lay with an army composed of the flower of the French troops and nobility.

The

march to the gates
of Paris.

Being still faithful to his maxim of not fighting, he saw from his palace the smoke of the buildings burnt by the English, but without making an effort to take the field; and, as he had predicted, the English having spent their fury fell back upon Anjou.

Continuation of the war in Aquitain.

The Gascon nobility had now no safety but in uniting to support the interest of Charles in Aquitain, where de Guesclin was ordered to command under the dukes of Berry and Anjou. The prince of Wales continued still to be afflicted with a dropsy, which prevented his taking the field; and the castle of Aguillon, reckoned the strongest in France, which had baffled the attempts of the duke of Burgundy at the head of a hundred thousand men, was taken by a French army of twelve thousand, after a siege of no more than four weeks. At the same time, the duke of Bourbon, and the count of Alençon, besieged Limoges. The prince of Wales saw their progress, with grief and vexation, but being joined by some English troops under his brother the duke of Lancaster, he ordered himself to be carried in a litter to Cognac upon the Charente, where he had appointed his rendezvous, intending to march from thence to the relief of Limoges; but before his arrival it was taken by Guesclin. Notwithstanding this, the prince of Wales resolved, before his return, to do some thing worthy his great name, which was still terrible to the French, and swore, by, the greatest of all his oaths, the soul of his father, that he would retake Limoges, or die before its walls. The efforts of the English were so vigorous, that they forced their entrance into the place, where they they put all to the sword without regard to age, sex, or condition; an inexcusable severity, especially in so humane a conqueror, though, probably, he thought that the place had been betrayed to the French by its inhabitants. Three French noblemen made so brave a defence that they obtained quarter, and gained the friendship of the prince, who did not put a stop to the slaughter; till above four thousand people were put to the sword. This was the last warlike exploit performed by the brave Black Prince, who now sent his troops into winter quarters.

Guesclin made constable of France.

Guesclin had signalized himself so greatly, that Charles, who was an excellent judge of mankind, created him constable of France; an honour which he for some time refused on account of the meanness of his birth, and the vast power it gave him of commanding even the princes of the blood. Instead of going into winter quarters, he fell into the territories of the duke of Bretagne, for his attachment to the English; and understanding that the English commanders under Knolles had split among themselves, he attacked and defeated them separately before they could reunite; but Knolles and his division found means to retire to Bretagne, where they were forced to shut themselves up in fortresses. De Guesclin, upon his return to Paris, laid before before his master, Charles, the necessity of detaching the king of Navarre from Edward. Those two princes had entered together into a treaty, by which Edward promised the duchy of Burgundy to the king of Navarre, with such other advantages and concessions, as, if they had been carried into execution, would have rendered him as powerful in France, as Charles was, or he himself had ever been. This treaty, however, was not to be ratified unless the prince of Wales should give his consent to the same; which, as appears by a letter from Edward to the king Navarre, published by Mr. Rymer, and dated the twenty-second of January 1371, he refused to do; on which the treaty came to nothing.

By the mediation of the archbishop of Rouen, Charles Negotia- and the king of Navarre had an interview, in which the tions for latter gave up, for the city and county of Montpelier, the peace. cities of Mante, and Meulan, together with the earldom of Longueville. At the same time, he gave his two sons to Charles as hostages for the performance of the treaty, which was concluded in June. Charles having now little to apprehend from the English, published several ordinances for abolishing the animosities that prevailed among his great lords; while the prince of Wales, as the only chance he had for his life, prepared to return to his native air in England, and taking a solemn leave of the French barons, who still continued attached to his person, he landed this year at Southampton, leaving the duke of Lancaster to command for him in Aquitain. Upon his departure for England, the French made themselves masters of several important places, and Charles every where employed agents in remonstrating to the Poitevine lords their danger and folly in continuing longer attached to the English. The lord Thomas Percy, however, and several of the English officers there, performed many brave actions, and took the castle of Montcontour; but Guesclin, with the dukes of Berry and Burgundy under him, more than repaired all the losses the French met with in this campaign.

The credit of Charles was so great at this time, with his Liberality subjects, that they granted him hearth-money, and subject- of the ed themselves to the same taxes that had been raised for the French to ransom of his father. The war was so widely spread, that Charles. even these were insufficient for supporting it; for which reason, he squeezed the officers of his finances, and borrowed considerable sums, both from the clergy, and the lawyers of his dominions. It was about this time, that Charles entered into an alliance with Robert II. who had been high steward of Scotland, but had now succeeded, in right of his mother, to that crown. This was always a favourite connection with the kings of France; and St. Lewis had so high an opinion of the fidelity of the Scots, that he trusted the safety of his person to twenty-four of that nation, which which was the original of the Scotch guards in France; but that number was by Charles encreased to an hundred, an institution which remained long in force, and is still nominally kept up. About the same time, the cardinal bishop of Beauvais, resigned the post of chancellor of France, as being incompatible with the places he held under the pope; but it was given to his brother.

The duke of Lancaster was now a widower, and kept his court at Bordeaux. The mediation of the pope, who employed the cardinal of Beauvais, and the archbishop of Canterbury, to negotiate a peace, had proved ineffectual. The two princesses of Castile, whom their deceased father had given to the prince of Wales as hostages for his good faith, remained still at Aire in Gascony, and were celebrated for their beauty and accomplishments. As Henry of Castile had been always one of Charles's best friends, and chief supports, the duke of Lancaster and his brother, thought they could not do their father better service than by marrying the two princesses, which they accordingly did; the duke of Lancaster espousing the eldest, Constantia, as the earl did her sister, Isabella. The meaning of those double marriages was plain to all Europe, and they served only to attach Henry more firmly than ever to the king of France. They renewed their alliances both offensive and defensive; and Henry, after settling all matters in dispute between himself and the kings of Navarre, and Portugal, fitted out a powerful squadron of ships, (some of which carried cannon) with an intention to fall upon the coasts of Poitou, and Xantoigne. The duke of Lancaster and his brother, with their brides, were now in England, and the capital of Burche commanded in Aquitain.

In the beginning of the year 1372, the conferences for peace were renewed at London, but came to nothing; and the preparations of Edward for war were greater than ever. He ordered two armies to be raised; the command of one was given to the duke of Lancaster, who was to invade France by the way of Calais and Picardy, while the earl of Pembroke was to act at the head of another in Aquitain.

Charles was always excellently well served with intelligence at the English court, and gaining an exact knowledge of Edward's plans, he persuaded the Castilian admiral, who was then lying off Rochele, to wait for that division of the English fleet which carried the earl of Pembroke. That nobleman accordingly fell in with the Castilians, whose ships were so much superior to those of the English, that they gained a complete victory. The bravest of the English knights and soldiers were killed. The earl of Pembroke, and Sir Guiscard de Langle, a favourite with Edward, were taken prisoners; the English fleet was in a manner entirely destroyed, and the Castilians returned victorious to their own coasts, after giving Edward the severest blow he had ever ever experienced. Charles expecting every day another landing under the duke of Lancaster, was very uneasy when the Castilian fleet left his coasts, and the Rochellers would certainly have declared for him, had they not been overawed by the captal of Buche, who threw himself into that city. He ordered his constable de Guesclin, however, to reduce all that part of Poitou, and Xantoigne, where the English had yet any possessions.

The descendant of a Welch prince, as he pretended, whose name was Owen, had for some time borne a considerable command in the French armies; and Charles had entrusted him with the command of a fleet, carrying four thousand men, with whom he made a descent upon the isle of Guernsey. He was opposed by one Ross Edwards, governor of the island; but Owen killed four hundred of his men, and besieged the remainder in Cornet castle. The place proving stronger than was expected, and the Castilian fleet at the same time leaving the coast of France, Charles ordered Owen to return with his ships to the harbour of Harfleur, and himself to sail after the Castilians, to persuade them to sail back to guard the French coasts. Owen executed his commission with great dispatch and address, and Henry of Castile accordingly ordered his ships to return as Charles had directed. In the mean while, the consternation of the English at the defeat of their fleet was inexpressible, and the arms of Charles continued to give them new defeats, and make fresh acquisitions from them in France. All his generals had united their troops, nor could the activity of the captal of Buche prevent St. Severe, and many other places, from falling into the constable's hands, and at last Poitiers itself was given up to him by a French party within its walls. By this time, the Castilian fleet had blocked up the harbour of Rochelle, but desisted from farther hostilities, as some of the principal inhabitants gave the Castilian admiral, don Roderigo, assurances, that they would take the first opportunity to declare for Charles.

The constable had sent a detachment of his army to besiege Soubize in Xantoigne, which was defended by a lady. The captal of Buche marched to her relief and defeated the besiegers; but was himself defeated and taken prisoner by Owen, who hearing of his design, had marched from Harfleur. His captivity was an irretrievable loss to the English interest in France; and though immense sums were offered for his ransom, yet he died, about five years after, in prison at Paris. After this, St. John d'Argeli, Tailebourg, Angoulesme, Xainte, all of them places of great importance, with others of less, were surrendered to the French; but the greatest loss the English sustained at this time, was that of Rochelle. That city had submitted to Edward with the utmost reluctance; the inhabitants claimed many antient privileges, and were at very little pains to conceal their aversion to the English government; government, but they were bridled by an English garrison in their citadel, which was, in the absence of Sir John Devereux, its governor, commanded by one Maufel, who could not read. They produced an old deed, which they pretended to be an order from Edward, that the garrison and the townsmen in arms should be reviewed in the town next day. Maufel fell into the snare, and when he had marched out of the citadel he found his return to it stopt up by a strong party of the inhabitants, who had been placed in ambush, while another party attacked in front. As the garrison was small he was overpowered and taken prisoner, while the few English that had been left in the castle were obliged to surrender it.

Noble spirit of the Ro-
chellers.

The Rochellers shewed themselves worthy of liberty. They took possession of the citadel, and acquainted the princes of the blood and the court, of their success; but insisted upon their obtaining three conditions before they surrendered either their town or citadel to the king. First, that the citadel should be demolished; secondly, that they should be allowed a coinage, with the same privileges as that of Paris; and lastly, that Rochelle should never again, upon any pretext, be dismembered from the crown of France. The princes and the constable thought proper to refer the Rochellers to Charles, and a deputation of twelve of their number repairing to court, he granted all their demands. A number of forts dependant upon Rochelle followed its fate, and were surrendered to the French, who at last prepared to besiege Thouars, one of the strongest places remaining to the English in France, and the town in which the Poitevine nobility, who remained still faithful to Edward, had shut themselves up with their riches till they could be succoured from England. They were so vigorously pressed by the French that they agreed to deliver up both Thouars, and all their castles, if they were not relieved before Michaelmas, but, till then, a suspension of arms was to take place; and they were at liberty to acquaint Edward with their situation.

Thouars
reduced by the French.

Their messengers found Edward busied in preparations for retaking Rochelle in person, which had retarded the duke of Lancaster, who was still in England. The armament equipped by Edward, both for the sea and land service, was immense; and the fame of it had revived the hopes of the English party in France so greatly, that they had again taken the field, in hopes of being supported by Edward. He accordingly put to sea; but was, by contrary winds, forced to put back in the beginning of October, and to disembark his troops.

The capitulation for Thouars was now expired. The English army in Poitou offered to march to the relief of the garrison; but received for answer, that, by the terms of their agreement, they did not think themselves at liberty to admit admit of any relief but from Edward or one of his sons. This answer sufficiently indicated, that they had been all along in a correspondence with the French; they submitted accordingly; and their example was followed by many others.

Edward finding himself disappointed in his attempt to invade France in person, laid a plan for enabling the duke of Bretagne, who owed his all to the friendship of England, to make head against the progress of the French. Charles had a strong party amongst the Breton nobility; and the constable, as well as Oliver de Clisson, who was now the most inveterate enemy the English had in France, was a native of that province. They chose being feudatories to France rather than England; and they told their duke, in plain terms, that, if he intended to declare for Edward, preferably to Charles, he was to expect no assistance or support from them.

The duke, impelled by his hatred of the Valois family, and the suggestions of three English officers, Knolles, Nevil, and Milbourn, who were at his court, disregarded this declaration. He was summoned by Charles to attend him with all his force, and to pay him his homage. He pleaded the stipulation in the treaty of Bretigni, by which he was to enjoy a neutrality; but he was answered, that that treaty had been, by the states of France, declared to be void. The appeal was now made to the sword; and the nobility prevailed with all the places where they had interest, to declare for Charles. Edward sent some troops and shipping, under the earl of Salisbury, to the duke's assistance; but the constable, Guesclin, besieged and took Siveray and Niort itself; and, in a short time, reduced all that part of Aquitain as far as the banks of the Garonne; and then went to Paris. It was not long before he was ordered to march with a fresh army to support the Breton barons, who had now taken the field against their duke; and, being joined by a great body of Normans, made a vast progress in that country.

When we read the original histories of France at that time, we meet with the names of so many towns and castles besieged, reduced, or revolted, that we are apt to think that the whole land was covered with fortifications. The truth is, that, besides the nature of the feudal constitution, which required every lord of a fief to have a castle, or strong place, upon his estate, the French had many additional inducements for multiplying such places of protection. The long wars between them and the Normans; the vast disorders that prevailed all over the country while they were engaged in the ruinous crusades; the state of war they were obliged to live in upon the return of those crusaders, needy and naked, home; and, above all, the ravages and insults of the companies, or disbanded soldiers, which were of long standing, rendered it unsafe for any gentleman to live in a house that was not, in some degree, fortified. Add to this, the dissensions among private families, so incident to feudal tenures. We are not, however, to imagine the numerous forts and castles that figure in the French history of those days, to have been all of them places of considerable strength. Most of them, as upon the borders between England and Scotland, were built to resist flying parties; and they never failed to yield to the first summons of a regular army; so that they always followed the fortune of the field. Such are the reasons why we have omitted the mention of a great number of sieges and places to be found in the French historians of this time.

Poitou lost to the English. Poitou was now entirely lost to the English; and Charles gave it to his brother, the duke of Berry. The duke of Bretagne was again summoned to appear before Charles's court; but neglecting to obey, he was declared to have forfeited all right to his duchy; and the army, now commanded by Guesclin, was ordered to execute the sentence. The duke, unable to resist it in the field, fortified his strongest places in the best manner he could, with the assistance of English officers and soldiers, left the defence of his country to Sir Robert Knolles, and went over to England, where he found great preparations going forward to assist him.

Edward had a fleet at sea under the earl of Salisbury, who burnt several Spanish vessels in the ports of Bretagne, and alarmed all that coast. On the other hand, the cities of Rennes, Dinant, and Vannes, opened their gates to the constable. The garrison of Luzemont was put to the sword for the resistance it made; as were, for the same reason, all the English in Hennebonne; their two brave commanders excepted, Sir Thomas Wyche and Sir Thomas Frier. Sir John Langley, the governor, was the only Englishman who had quarter given him when Conquet was taken.

Progress of Guesclin.

At last, Guesclin (whose rapid successes were, in a great measure, owing to a vast train of artillery he carried with him) formed the siege of Brest; which, because of the English superiority at sea, he turned into a blockade. At the same time, he invested Roch sur Yon, Becherel, St. Saviour, and Derval. These were prodigious operations; and the whole was a proof of the constable's vast military genius. Knolles, who defended Brest, had intelligence that it would be relieved; and concluded a treaty with the constable for giving it up, if the blockade was not raised in forty days; upon which, Knolles threw himself into the castle of Derval, which belonged to his private estate.

His duplicity.

We can suppose no cause, but the rooted hatred of the French to the English, for the former carrying on so inter-necional a war as they did, at this time, against the latter. Clisson made it a rule to give no quarter to the English; and even Guesclin, open and gallant as he is represented to have been,

been, behaved with an infamous duplicity towards them. Knolles had given hostages for the performance of his capitulation concerning Brest; one condition of which was, that the army coming to relieve it should offer battle to the constable; which the earl of Salisbury, having landed his men, actually did; and demanded the English hostages to be set at liberty. Guesclin declined giving battle, and evaded the other demand, by saying that the French would fight the English at Nantes, where the capitulation was made. Salisbury re-inforced the garrison of Brest, and the constable was mean enough to commit the English hostages to close prison. The siege of Derval went on. Its governor, Sir Hugh Bright, had given hostages for surrendering it if not relieved in two months. The duke of Anjou, who commanded the siege, demanded the performance of the capitulation. Knolles replied, that his deputy had no power to make it. The duke ordered the heads of the three English hostages, two knights, and an esquire, to be struck off. Three French gentlemen were treated in the same manner by Knolles, and their heads thrown into the duke's camp; upon which he raised the siege.

Edward was, all this while, continuing his preparations to retrieve his affairs in France. His son, the incomparable prince of Wales, was then on his death-bed; but another of his sons, the duke of Lancaster, who, in his wife's right, now assumed the title of king of Castile, and Leon, emulated the Black Prince's glories; but without possessing either his virtues or his genius. An army of fifty (some say only thirty, but many of them men at arms) thousand men was raised in England, under the command of the duke of Lancaster; who, with the duke of Bretagne, landed at Calais. Charles had foreseen this invasion, and provided for it upon his own maxims of not fighting. He kept about his person a body of four thousand men at arms, and a considerable force of infantry. He sent three armies into the field: one under the constable, with orders to cover Champagne; and the other two under the dukes of Burgundy, and Bourbon, who were to attend the motions of the English army, cut off their provisions and stragglers, and straiten their quarters, but with express orders not to venture a battle. The duke of Bretagne naturally pressed the duke of Lancaster to begin his operations by relieving his dutchy; but which he John of Ghent, madly resolved to proceed to Guienne. He accordingly begun his march to a country so thoroughly ruined by his enemies, that before they reached Bordeaux, he lost all his horses, and four fifths of his troops, without having any satisfaction, but that of braving the whole military force of France in the field; for Charles had taken his measures so justly, that the English could not master one place of strength. Charles beheld the madness of the English with silent contempt, and is said to have defrayed great part of the expence of this campaign by a tax he raised upon the Jews for suffering them to continue ten years longer in his dominions. He lost, at this time, his two capital ministers, the cardinal of Beauvais, and his brother the chancellor, who were succeeded by the bishop of Amiens, and Peter d'Argemont; but notwithstanding his good fortune, his country, as indeed Italy, and England, was now desolated by the plague and famine.

This, together with the great subsidies granted to Edward by his English parliament, might be the chief reasons, why Charles did not seem averse to the pope's indefatigable exhortations for a peace between the two crowns. Those conferences began at Bordeaux, and were continued at Bourges, but with no great effect, while the duke of Anjou kept the field, and obtained several advantages in Higher Gascony, and the earldom of Foix. In the mean while, a truce was concluded under the mediation of the pope, which was to last from the tenth of April 1374, to the last of August that year. Before the expiration of the truce the duke of Anjou had brought the count of Foix to declare for his father; and before the end of the year, the English were stripped of all they held in Guienne and Gascony, excepting Boyonne and Bordeaux, and a few other places of no consequence. The duke of Lancaster having left a considerable part of his army with the duke of Bretagne, to whose territories the late truce had not extended, who having in the winter received fresh reinforcements under the earl of Cambridge from England, had recovered great part of his dutchy. He took the castles of St. Mahi, and St. Paul de Leon, where the English put all the French to the sword; and he was upon the point of taking Cliffon and Quimperlay, when he received advice from the duke of Lancaster of a new truce having been agreed on for a year, in which his dutchy of Bretagne was included, and requiring that duke to give over hostilities. As his chief support lay among the English, he was obliged to comply; but in fact, the duke of Lancaster privately was his enemy. Soon after the conclusion of the truce, negotiations were set on foot for a definitive treaty; but it ended in a truce, which was extremely prejudicial to the English.

A truce.

State of
affairs.

This short respite of a truce was of infinite service to France, by leaving Charles at liberty to regulate the internal affairs of his kingdom. He then passed the famous edict, which he caused to be registered in parliament, and thereby declared to be a perpetual and fundamental law of his kingdom, by which the majority of all his successors to the crown of France was fixed to their entering their fourteenth year. The death of the duke of Orleans, added considerably to his finances, by the crown being his heir; and though Charles lived, as to his own person, below the magnificence of a private lord, yet he was generous and magnificent towards all who served him well, either in the field of the cabinet, but especially to the constable Guesclin. Notwithstanding this, he had always by him immense sums of ready money, to supply the means of carrying on the war.

When he heard of the death of the prince of Wales, he ordered a solemn service to be performed for his soul; and the prince being sensible that many of the French were personally attached to him, he wisely published an amnesty, or pardon, for all that had happened, inviting them back to their allegiance to his crown. The pope, in the mean while, did all he could to convert the truce, which was to continue till June 1376, into a definitive treaty, which might have been easily done, had not Charles been secretly averse to all terms of peace, from the profound desire he had to reannex Calais, and the other places which Edward still held in Picardy, to the crown of France. It was with this view, that though he had great reason to be dissatisfied with the conduct of the Stuart family in Scotland, he received their ambassadors with distinguished honours, and by promising to pay the remainder of their king's (David's) ransom, he prevailed upon them to agree to renounce all the truces they had made with England, exclusive of France; promising at the same time, to continue his usual subsidies to the Scots, and to prevail with the pope to absolve them from their oaths. When these infamous proposals, agreed to by the Scotch deputies, were transmitted to king Robert, he had the virtue to reject them; but he concluded another treaty with Charles of a more warrantable nature, by which the two kings agreed that the pope could not dispense with the obligations they lay under to each other, and that the subjects of neither should serve the English in their wars with France or Scotland; a stipulation which proved of infinite service to the French. Charles, about the same time, renewed his alliances with the king of Castile, who continued to be still the most formidable naval power in Europe, and no sooner did the truce with England expire, than their joint fleet made a descent upon England, and burnt the town of Rye.

By this time, the war had been renewed with various success in France; but Edward III. as well as his son the brave prince of Wales, was now dead. Charles did not know of Edward's death till some weeks after it happened, and then too only by such of his troops as had returned from their expedition into England. This, with the expiration of the truce, occasioned the war to rage with more fury than ever. The English marine was in no condition to withstand the united fleets of France and Castile, who burnt the towns of Hastings, Portsmouth, Dartmouth, and Plymouth, and reduced all the isle of Wight, excepting the castle of Carisbroke. During those operations by sea, the duke of Burgundy, at the head of one army, entered Picardy, and reduced the town of Ardres, while the duke of Anjou defeated

Sir Thomas Felton, who was governor of Aquitain under Richard, the young king of England, and with the assistance of the constable took Bergerac, the only place of great importance that remained to the English in Gascony; but the councils of young Richard were now so miserably divided, that his patrimony in France was given up as a prey to Charles and his generals.

Germany dauphin, the vicariate of the empire, and the old kingdom visits of Arles. The king of Navarre, at this time, appears, by Charles. his inconstancy and treachery to all parties, to have been neglected by all. He was accused of conspiring with certain Normans, who were executed, to poison Charles, who seized upon all his possessions in Normandy, and the lordship of Montpelier. Neither the French nor the English historians, perhaps, have done sufficient justice to the memory of that prince; because, as we have already mentioned, his claim upon the crown of France, was undoubtedly preferable to that of Edward, and to that of Charles likewise, had it not been for the new invented, or as others call it, the revived, scheme of the salic laws. In the year 1377, Charles lost his queen, whom he sincerely lamented.

Vol. X. We have already taken notice of the adoption of Lewis and the concern which the French cardinals had in the election of pope Clement VII. which gave rise to a long schism in the church.

Who loses the Bre- Charles being tolerably easy on the side of England, tons. and fully instructed as to the differences reigning at that court, proceeded now to execute his favourite plan of re-annexing the dutchy of Bretagne to his crown. This plan, however practicable it appeared to be, was highly detrimental to his affairs. The Breton noblemen, had never pushed their opposition to their duke farther than to oblige him to pay his homage to the king of France rather than of England; but they had no idea of any project of reannexation, and they entertained still a personal affection for their duke. In short, it was then seen, that it was chiefly to their hatred for England that they had ranged themselves under the banners of Charles. Such were the sentiments even of his faithful constable Guesclin, to whom Charles owed almost every thing, and this created between them so great a coldness, that Guesclin was on the point of throwing up his command, and retiring to Castile; and though Charles found means to divert him, he declared he never would serve him farther in his quarrel against his country. It appears, as if Charles, who managed so many great wars and important concerns without leaving

his cabinet, was not perfectly acquainted with the dispositions of the Bretons. He had cashiered them from his army, and they entered into the service of their duke, and the English, which gave a turn to the war.

Sir Hugh Calverley, the English governor of Calais, burnt Boulogne, and twenty-six French ships in its port, and obtained several other considerable advantages in Picardy. The war renewed. The lord Thomas Piercy, took twenty-two ships belonging to the Spaniards, and the Flemings, who had joined them; and a citizen of London, alderman Philpot, though only a private adventurer, had still greater success against the French and Spaniards by sea.

The king of Navarre had put the English in possession of The Cherbourg, the only place of consequence that remained to English him in Normandy; but they were roughly handled by the ravage Spanish shipping before they landed. The duke of Lancaster was now at the head of the English affairs, and the French coasts. thought that he could not succeed in the claim he had upon Castile so effectually, as by continuing the war vigorously with France. He soon formed a marine superior to that of the latter. He passed over in person to France, burnt a Spanish who French fleet in the harbour of St. Malo, and besieged the town, but, through the vigilance of the constable he could not take it, though he is said to have had four hundred cannon in his train; and he was obliged to reembark his troops. The duke of Berry had besieged Cherbourg, but was beaten with great loss, by Sir Robert Rouse, its governor, and took Oliver de Guesclin, brother to the constable, prisoner. Those sprinklings of success encouraged the Flemings to declare for England, and the duke of Bretagne sold Brest to the English. The latter, from their sea-ports, ravaged the coast of Normandy, and the English ministry thinking that the sea was the element upon which they could act with the greatest success, applied now to the restoration of their marine, with such assiduity, that they did incredible damage to the commerce both of France and Spain.

Charles could not be easy while Brest was in the hands of the English; but the reannexation of the duchy of Bretagne to his crown was so glaring a violation of the rights of the Blois family, (whose property it indisputably was, supposing the Montfort's to have forfeited it,) that his difficulties daily increased on that side. Their success in the inland parts. Sir Hugh Calverley, and Sir Thomas Piercy, who were then joint admirals of England, were victorious on the French coasts, where they destroyed many ships; and Dinant, Rennes, and Vannes, surrendered to the duke of Bretagne, upon his return from England to his own duchy. It happened, luckily for Charles, that the duke of Lancaster was so intent upon his Castile claim, (not to mention their former differences) that he did not so vigorously support the duke of Bretagne as he might have done.

done. This gave Charles leisure to buy off the earl of Juliers from the English interest, and to renew, upon very advantageous terms, his Castilian league, with John, the son of Henry of Transtamar, who was now dead. By this new treaty, Charles was to pay twelve hundred francs a month for the use of twenty large Castilian ships, who were to be entirely under his direction, though commanded by Castilian officers, and to be employed against the English.

Death of Guesclin. The successes of the English in Picardy, Auvergne, and the Limousin, still continuing, Charles, who had no notion of resentment of any kind, but what was dictated by interest, began to relish the advice given by Guesclin, to make the duke of Bretagne his friend; notwithstanding the recent attempt to reannex his estates to the crown, and the deep rooted inveteracy between them. The war with the English still continued to rage, and the brave constable de Guesclin died by the fatigue he had contracted in besieging Chateaufneuf, which was to have been surrendered to him the day of his death, and the deputies accordingly laid its keys at the feet of his corpse.

New invasion of France by the English. In 1380, the court of England, to break off all connections between the duke of Bretagne and the king of France, again landed a large army at Calais, commanded by the earl of Buckingham, their king's uncle, and the flower of the English nobility. They were attended by an army of observation under the duke of Burgundy; who was, as usual, bound up by Charles from fighting, but their numbers were greatly diminished by their fatigue and sickness in marching to besiege Nantes, the only city of importance that now held out for Charles in Bretagne. He saw the inutility of prosecuting his designs upon that dutchy; but, by promises to the Breton lords that he would restore the duke and them to all their rights and privileges, provided they would shake off their dependence upon the English, he prevailed with them not to join the latter; and the earl of Buckingham was obliged to raise the siege and march into winter quarters.

Death, character and issue of Charles. Charles began now to perceive the approach of death by the stopping of an issue he had in his arm, and dedicated to the future good government of his kingdom the hours that he could spare from his devotions. His son being a minor, he sent for the dukes of Berry, Burgundy, and Bourbon, (his eldest brother the duke of Anjou, being then in Italy;) and desired they would marry the young king to a German princess, that he might strengthen his interest in the empire; that they would give the constables sword to Oliver de Clisson; and that they would take the first opportunity of easing the people of their enormous load of taxes. After this, he prepared, with great resignation, for his death, which happened on the sixteenth of September 1380, in the forty-fourth year of his age, and the seventeenth of his reign.

Some writers attribute his death to poison, which had been given to him twenty years before by the king of Navarre. No man had ever a more mechanical turn than Charles had for business of every kind. His operations were sure, slow and silent, and he seemed to be without passion of any sort, though at the same time, no man knew better how to punish when opportunity presented. He courted advice, and heard with great attention the different opinions of his counsellors, whom he usually dismissed without forming any resolution; but he always was determined by his own judgment. He had some maxims uncommon to princes of his calm, frugal cast; for though he was privately parsimonious, he was liberal even to excess to those who served him well, and used to say, that to be parsimonious was the true way to be cheated. He always paid in ready money, of which he still took care to have great plenty at hand. Some writers are of opinion that he pushed his practice of amassing treasure to unwarrantable lengths; and we are told, that, on the very day of his death he remitted several of the taxes he had laid upon his subjects.

In the general dispatch of his affairs he seemed to have few ideas but those of interest; but by an unusual turn of mind, he was the greatest patron and encourager of learning of any prince of his time. Books were the most agreeable present that could be made him; and Christina of Pisa, who knew him well, and lived at his court, tells us he had a competent knowledge of Latin and the rules of grammar. At the time of his accession to the throne, all the books of the royal library of France did not exceed twenty; but he increased them to nine hundred, and they were lodged in three chambers within the castle of the Louvre, where he generally resided. But besides this library, we are told, that he had others in different castles, though there is some reason for suspecting that most of the books in these belonged to the grand collection in the Louvre, and were placed there only for the king's convenience. These were chiefly composed of Latin, and French translations of the bible, missals, breviaries, psalters, and other books of devotion, all which were magnificently bound and illuminated, according to the custom of the times, before printing was known in Europe. Translations into Latin or French, of Arabian authors, physicians particularly, formed another division of this library, and the translators were employed and paid by the king himself; but its most valuable part is said to have consisted of history, particularly that of France. Charles was so true a Frenchman, that though he could read and understand Latin, yet he ordered Titus Livius, Valerius, Maximus, Augustine de Civitate Dei, and some other favourite works to be translated into French, because he never would read them in their original; and there is still in the French king's library a magnificent translation of Titus Livius, which which had been executed by his order, if not by himself; and in the reign of Henry V. or VI. of England, had been carried to England by the regent duke of Bedford; but had been recovered by the count of Angoulesme, who bought it at London in the year 1441.

Charles V. by patience and perseverance, did greater things, than any prince of his time, by enterprize, and yet he was subject to the weaknesses of the age. Hearing of an Italian, one Thomas of Bologna, father to the famous Christina of Pisa, he invited him to France, and engaged him, at a large expence, to reside about his person in quality of his astrologer. His fixed appointments amounted to a hundred francs a month, a vast sum in those times. The presents made him by the king amounted to at least the same sum, and he had a promise of five hundred livres a year for himself and his posterity. Charles was of opinion, that the French monarchy would decay as soon as the kings and great men of France should neglect or discourage learning. His way of living was perfectly regular; his appearance of irresolution, and of his not being determined, often imposed upon his enemies, and his courtiers frequently solicited him to enter into measures, which, without their knowledge, he had already executed. Though he seldom headed his armies of enterprize in person, yet their successes were generally owing to the great care he took in providing them with magazines, and all kind of resources in case of a defeat. His wife Joan, daughter of Philip, duke of Bourbon, was a princess of great accomplishments, both in body and mind; and Charles had accustomed her to the affairs of the cabinet, the better to qualify her to be regent to his successor in case of a minority. By her he had two sons, Charles who succeeded him, five daughters, who died young, and Catharine, who was married to the duke of Montpensier, son to the duke of Berry, but had no issue.

Charles VI.

The duke
of Anjou appointed regent of France.

THE duke of Anjou, eldest brother to Charles V. was busy about his promised succession in Naples, when he heard of his brother's death; and the parliament appointed him regent of the kingdom during the minority of the young king, who was no more than twelve years of age; but his education was committed to the care of his two uncles, the dukes of Burgundy and Bourbon. So jealous were the French, at this time, of their feudal rights, that the duke of Burgundy, as being the first peer of France, took place at the council board of his elder brother, the duke of Anjou, whose elevation to the regency was looked upon with an evil eye by the duke of Berry. After the coronation coronation had been performed at Rheims, the constable's sword was delivered to Oliver de Clisson, and the new administration set out with the popular measure of suppressing the most heavy of the taxes. The office of regent was not then well defined by the French constitution, and the duke of Anjou seized the immense treasures, jewels, and plate of the late king, to enable him to execute his ambitious views upon the crown of Naples. The dukes of Berry and Burgundy acted with equal rapaciousness in their several departments; and the regent hearing of an old servant of the late king who knew of some of his hidden treasures, obliged the man, with an executioner's axe over his head, to discover where they were hid between two walls.

Never were two governments more dissimilar to each other than that of the late king and the regency. All the servants of Charles V. were now disgraced; the chancellor of his retired from court; the bishop of Amiens, who was immensely rich, fled to Avignon; and the duke of Burgundy, who took the lead in the king's education, soothed him in all his natural propensity to youthful gaiety and dissipation. The duke of Berry demanded the government of Languedoc, of which he had been deprived, because of his oppressions, by the late king, who gave it to the count of Foix. Being backed by the duke of Anjou, the duke of Berry prevailed; but the people refused to submit to his government, and he was beaten by the count of Foix, who not knowing whether what he had done might not be construed into rebellion by the parliament, retired to his own estate, and made up matters with the duke of Berry. The monstrous expences of the duke of Anjou to support his Neapolitan claims, made him tax the people to such a degree, that the commonalty in Paris broke out into an insurrection. Being armed chiefly with mallets, they were thence called maillotins, and at first they were guilty of such inhumanities, that the king and his council retired from Paris. The better sort of the citizens, however, being well armed, easily suppressed the mob; notwithstanding which, the duke of Anjou made them responsible for the outrages of their inferiors, and obliged them to pay a hundred thousand livres, by way of fine, before they could obtain their pardon.

The death of Charles V. occasioned a great turn to the prejudice of the English in France. The duke of Bretagne had not the same invincible personal hatred for Charles VI. as he had for his father; and he was secretly convinced that the advice of his nobility, who wanted him to prefer a French to an English, subjection, was the best he could follow; but being a man of honour, he lived in good terms with the earl of Buckingham, who wintered in Bretagne; and the duke only sought for an opportunity of abandoning the English without seeming to break his faith. The Breton nobility saved him that trouble. They sent a splendid deputation to the earl, to acquaint him, that, notwithstanding the high esteem their duke and they had for the English nation, they were unanimously resolved that his army should not continue longer in their country than the first conveniency that should offer itself for their departure. The earl dissembled his thoughts, dismissed the deputies with the utmost politeness, and had the address to procure an interview with the duke at Rennes, where he was upon the point of persuading him to renew all his engagements with the English, till he was dissuaded from it by Robert Beaumanoir, who confirmed him in his former resolution. In the mean while, his nobility made his and their peace with the court of France. The chief terms were, that the duke should publicly, on his knees, ask pardon of that king, and that both he and his barons should swear never to join either the king of England, or Navarre, against the crown and kingdom of France; and that the duke should immediately pay homage to the king for that dutchy. The clergy and nobility of Bretagne were likewise obliged to swear, that, if the duke should violate his engagements, they would join the king against him. It was with difficulty that, in April 1381, the earl of Buckingham obtained transports and a convoy to him and his troops back to England.

Vol. X. About this time, the duke of Anjou had, with the late of Anjou. We have already mentioned the duke's death there without succeeding in his enterprize; and the return of the miserable remains of his army to France. The duke of Burgundy succeeded him in his authority at the French court.

Charles The Flemings were then in arms against the duke's father-subdues in-law, the count of Flanders, and the truce with England
the re- being prolonged, the duke of Burgundy entered with great volted zeal, into the interest of his father-in-law, whose heir he Flemings, expected to be in right of his wife. The Flemings had chosen Arteville, son to the famous brewer of that name, for their head, and he conducted their affairs with great abilities and success. He drove the count's party almost out of Flanders; and perceiving a great French army with its king at their head, he sent deputies over to England to solicit the protection of Richard II. but they could not prevail with that weak prince, and his ministry, to enter into the quarrel. His indecision proved fatal to the revolted Flemings. The duke of Burgundy, who commanded one of the finest armies France had ever raised, while Arteville was besieging Ouednard, passed the Lys and seized upon Ipres.
Before Arteville had accepted of the command of the Flem-
ings, he had made them promise that they should not listen to any terms of accommodation, and he had issued orders against giving quarter to any Frenchman, only, if possible, to take little king Charles, that he might be educated at Ghent, and learn to speak good Flemish. The duke of Burgundy, however, soon made such a progress, that the Ghentois recalled Arteville from the siege of Oudenard, and it was resolved to fight the French. The battle happened at Roseberque. The Flemings were defeated with the loss of twenty-five thousand men, among whom was their leader. The duke of Burgundy reestablished his father-in-law, and made use of the orders issued by Arteville against the French, to justify the most barbarous inhumanities which he exercised upon the Flemings.

During this Flemish expedition, the people of Paris, and partly stung by oppression, and partly through a seditious disposition, had been guilty of insults upon the royal authority, which the duke of Burgundy, now at the head of a victorious army, resolved severely to punish. The Parisians, apprehensive of this, welcomed their king in his approach to his capital in a body of thirty thousand men. This affected display of their power made no impression on the duke of Burgundy. The king entered Paris in triumph, and proceeded against its inhabitants as if they had been rebels; their gates were thrown down, their barricades demolished, three hundred of their principals were thrown into chains, and, for a fortnight, no day passed without signal executions; all the citizens being obliged to give up their arms. But the court wanted money as well as blood. The surviving burghesses were obliged to pay exorbitant sums for their pardon, though the king had deprived their city of its privileges. The discontented spirit of the Parisians extended itself to Orleans, Rouen, and many other great towns in France, who were punished by large fines; but all that was raised was so disproportioned to the rapaciousness of the court, that the army was disbanded without being paid.

The court of England, though it had unaccountably neglected to support the Flemings while they were victorious, imagined the French would make use of their late successes to besiege Calais, and the parliament voted an expedition against Flanders, (where Ghent still held out for the revolvers) and that the warlike bishop of Norwich should command it; and, after relieving Flanders, he was to march against France. The bishop accordingly landed at Calais, took possession of Dunkirk, with other places, and defeated the count of Flanders, who opposed him with thirty thousand men. After this, the bishop besieged Ipres, but his army being composed of mere rabble, and the place being defended by the best of the French troops, he abandoned his enterprize, left his arms and artillery in the hands of the enemy, and retreated with the main body of his army to Dunkirk; while some companies of mutineers fortified Bourbourg, which was immediately invested by the French king; who declared, that, if the besieged did not surrender, he would give them no quarter. The duke of Bretagne served with twelve thousand men under Charles, who treated him with such gross indignities, that, to clear his honour, he demanded to lead on the next attack in person, which he did with the greatest intrepidity, but was repulsed by the English. The flower of the French army was employed in the next attack, but was repulsed with still greater loss than the duke of Bretagne had sustained. At last, Charles, at the duke's repeated intercession, granted the garrison a capitulation, and they had leave to march to Calais with their horses, arms, and the rich booty they had made in France.

The truce with England prolonged.

The duke of Bretagne was severely censured by the court for their escape, and the French army marched against the bishop of Norwich, who was then at Gravelin; and who, finding that his soldiers were neither disposed to defend the place, nor his court to send him reinforcements, dismantled it, and returned with his army to England. This irruption renewed the war between the French and English in France, where the marquis of Sancerre expelled the latter from the Limousin, and their commerce suffered deeply from the Norman and Castilian squadrons. A truce, which was concluded for six months, put, at that time, an end to hostilities between the two nations. The duke of Lancaster and the earl of Buckingham were met in Picardy by the dukes of Berry and Burgundy; and some conferences passed concerning a treaty, but all they could do was to conclude a truce, which was to last till the first of May next year, 1385, and was to comprehend the Scots, and the duke of Lancaster, as king of Castile.

Death
count of Flanders.

This year was distinguished by the death of the count of Flanders, to whose succession the duke of Burgundy was heir, and he became thereby the richest, and consequently, the most powerful prince, upon the continent of Europe. The Ghentois still held out, and, at their request, Richard, as lord paramount of their country, sent Sir John Bouchier to command them. The duke of Burgundy looked upon this as an act of hostility, and persuaded his nephew to agree to a scheme of invading England. The admiral Vienne, to favour this invasion, was sent with fifty thousand pounds in gold to Scotland, to be distributed among the chief of that nobility, together with a considerable force for invading England by the north, at the time the descent was to be made on the south. The admiral acquitted himself perfectly well of his commission; but the unfavourable turn which affairs took against the duke of Burgundy in Flanders, made him employ the armaments that had been made for the descent to his own use. He persuaded Charles, once more, to march against the town of Dam, which had declared against the duke, and had joined in a conspiracy with the inhabitants of Sluys for burning the whole French fleet; and which was discovered only by the remorse of one of the conspirators. Dam was stormed by the French army, the garrison was put to the sword, all but a few who escaped to Ghent; but in the mean while, all farther thoughts of a descent upon England were laid aside. This did not discourage admiral Vienne, who still remained in Scotland, from making a strong impression upon England on the side of Northumberland, through the assistance of three thousand men lent him by Robert king of Scotland. His progress was such, that he intended to have pushed on into Wales, and to have joined the malecontents there, had not the Scots been obliged to return to the defence of their own country against the English.

Charles king of France was now seventeen years of age. Marriage He was healthful, vigorous, and had the finest person of of Charles any youth in his dominions, so that his ministry thought it to Isabella was high time he should marry. A daughter of the duke of Ba- of Lancaster, king of Castile, was proposed, as being a salu- varia. tary match for making up the differences between the two kingdoms; but the last advice of his father prevailed, and a German princess was picked on, Isabella, daughter to the duke of Bavaria. Charles insisted upon seeing her before he married her. The princess, attended by her mother, gave him the meeting at Amiens, where Charles became immediately so enamoured of her person, that the marriage was concluded.

It was about this time, that Lewis II. of Anjou, was pro- Vol. X. claimed by the pope king of the Two Sicilies, and Charles P. 157. taking his mother and brother into his protection, sent an army to reinstate him in the possession of Provence, which belonged to the Anjouvine family. The duke of Burgundy had now married his son to the heiress of Albert of Brabant, by whom his family had a prospect of succeeding to the counties of Zealand, Hainault, and Holland. His own authority was now perfectly re-established in the Low Countries, where even the Ghentois had submitted, and he resumed the project of a descent upon England with uncommon vigour and preparations. He proposed putting sixty thousand men, equally divided into infantry, cavalry, and cross-bows, on board twelve hundred vessels, and that their landing should be covered from the artillery of the English by a huge floating machine, which was to sail along with the fleet.

In the year 1386, the three chief places the English still A grand held in Bretagne and Picardy, Brest, Cherbourg, and Calais, descent were invested by the French; the first by the constable Clisson, upon Eng- in person. The duke of Lancaster had, about this time, set land. sail from England, and in his voyage he landed some troops under the lord Fitz Walter, who obliged the constable to raise raise the siege of Brest, and then the duke proceeded on his expedition. The news of his landing in Castile being made public, redoubled the duke of Burgundy's zeal for forwarding the armament against England, which, as he represented to Charles, was now disfurnished of its best and bravest troops. The force for the invasion was increased, and the vast wooden machine was so contrived that, upon the landing of the army, it might be taken to pieces and formed into booths for the protection of the soldiers in case of a winter's campaign. The duke of Berry, equally proud, covetous, and ambitious, began to be jealous of the duke of Burgundy's interest with Charles, and offended at himself having so little influence in public matters, and therefore he proceeded so slowly in raising his part of the troops, that the season was far spent before any embarkation was made. At last, about the middle of September the fleet set sail, amounting to about thirteen hundred ships; but it was dispersed by a storm, and great part of the shipping stranded upon the coast of Flanders, where the wooden machine was beat to pieces. The storm abating, a council of war was held, when it appeared that their provisions were beginning to spoil, and it was resolved, as the season was so far advanced, to postpone the expedition. The duke of Burgundy made even an advantage of this miscarriage, by obtaining from the king of France a gift of the port of Sluys, and the remains of the wooden machine which were driven ashore.

The disappointment of the descent from France, which had struck terror into the city of London itself, threatened to be attended with fatal consequences to the government of Charles. The ministry took great care to conceal from the king the true cause of its miscarriage, by contriving for him all manner of diversions; and all that the army, before it was disbanded, could do, was to prevent a general insurrection of the people, who were exasperated by their oppressions and taxes.

The duke of Bretagne throws the constable of France into irons. In the beginning of the year 1387, the English fleet under the earl of Arundel, insulted that of the French in their harbours; and after a sharp engagement took a hundred and twenty-six ships, richly laden, belonging to the Castilians and Flemings. The duke of Bretagne was now suspected more than ever by the French ministry, particularly the constable, Clisson, for being entirely in the interest of the English; and the constable, as a kind of check upon him, had prevailed with the French court to pay twenty-five thousand francs for the ransom of the son of Charles de Blois, who remained still a hostage in England, and to whom Clisson gave his daughter in marriage; though de Blois still continued to carry the arms of Bretagne. The duke resented this usurpation, as he thought it, and his displeasure must have been increased, if the manuscript proceeds against against the king of Navarre (still extant) is true, that the constable had made love to the duke's wife, Mary of England. The constable, and the admiral of France, were at that time, secretly preparing for a descent upon England, to be shipped from the ports of Bretagne and Normandy. The duke, in the mean while, invited Clisson to an entertainment at Vannes, where he put him in irons, and threw him into a dungeon; upon which, the designed invasion of England came to nothing. It appears as if the duke of Bretagne's resentment against the constable had been personal as well as political, for he was diverted from murdering him only by the prudence of those to whom he gave the orders. At last, he set him at liberty, upon paying a great ransom, and surrendering into the duke's hands all his fortresses.

Clisson had served his master too faithfully to be considered Charles in the light he deserved at such a court as that of Charles. declares himself The dukes of Burgundy and Berry received his complaints with great coldness, and all the satisfaction he obtained his own was the restitution of his forts by the duke of Bretagne. master, All the arts of his uncles could not keep Charles longer and no- ignorant of their management. The duke of Burgundy minates had endeavoured to divert him by an expedition against the a new duke of Guelders, who soon submitted; but upon his re- council. turn to Paris, he called a council at Rheims, consisting of persons of the greatest distinction in his court and kingdom. There, in a formal speech, he acquainted them, that he intended to take into his own hands the management of his kingdom, and to nominate a new council. This declaration was applauded by the cardinal bishop of Laon, who soon after died, as was thought of poison, administered to him through the practices of the dukes of Burgundy and Berry. Those princes were disgraced by Charles in no other shape than by his omitting them in the nomination of his new council, which, besides the duke of Bourbon, the constable, and the chancellor, consisted only of a few of his father's most faithful ministers.

No sooner did this great event take place, than Charles His signal appeared to be quite a new man, and one of the most amiable virtues. able princes that ever had filled the throne of France. He was affable, sensible and compassionate; he listened to the complaints of his subjects; he entered into measures for relieving them; he put his parliament and household upon a new and better footing; he abolished the taxes that were most grievous to his people; he restored his capital to its privileges and immunities, nor could envy or malevolence make the least impression upon his generous, unsuspecting temper; and he declared, on all occasions, that he would rather believe well of a bad man than hazard the suspecting a good man of ill. Those virtues were attended by so unaffected a gracefulness of person and behaviour, and so winning winning a condescension to every rank of people, that he entirely gained the hearts, of his subjects, and no prince, for some time, ever better deserved the epithet they gave him, that of the Wellbeloved. After his marriage, he indulged his natural love for magnificence so far as to permit his queen to make a public entry into his capital, and to be crowned with great solemnity; after which he attended the coronation of his cousin Lewis of Anjou, who, as we have already seen, was by pope Clement proclaimed king of the Two Sicilies, at Avignon. Returning from thence he examined the state of his subjects in Languedoc, which he did so humanely and impartially, that he took from the duke of Berry the government of that province. During this progress, the count de Foix, who died soon after, had an interview with Charles, and was so struck with his amiable qualifications that he made him his heir; but Charles generously resigned his right to the count's nephew. About the same time, his brother Lewis, duke of Touraine, afterwards duke of Orleans, married Valentina, daughter to the duke of Milan, after having endeavoured, but in vain, to marry the heiress of the Hungarian crown.

Practices
of the dukes of Burgundy
and Berry.

Charles now began to discover a spirit of enterprize, and from the heat of youth, proposed some romantic projects, which were discouraged by his wiser ministers; but he assisted the Genoese, and his other allies, and the crown of France suffered no diminution of its honour. The dukes of Burgundy and Berry, being now, by their dismissal, in the opposition to their court, influenced the duke of Bretagne to delay the execution of the late treaty, so far as related to the duke of Pentievre, son-in-law of the constable, who, on that account, in the year 1390, invaded the dutchy of Bretagne. Those dissensions presented to the English a fair opportunity of retrieving their affairs in France; but their domestic situation would not admit of any attempts of that kind; and all that the duke of Lancaster, who came this year over to France, could do, was to procure a continuation of the truce for another year.

Assassination of Cliffon.

By the death of the dutchess of Orleans, the king had an opportunity of bestowing upon the duke of Touraine that dutchy, though the inhabitants, who had seen the tyranny of the dukes of Burgundy and Berry, were extremely unwilling to have a prince of the blood for their master. The constable Cliffon, who was an honest, though rough and vindictive, man, acted, at this time, as the first, if not the sole minister to Charles, to the great mortification of the dukes of Burgundy and Berry, who employed one Peter Craon, a man who had been trusted by and betrayed all parties, and who, for his malversations, had been exiled by Charles to his own estate, to assassinate the constable, which he attempted, as the latter was returning from court in the night time, by his assassins, who gave him fifty wounds, and left him for dead, though he recovered almost miraculously. Craon finding he was discovered to be the author of this infamous attempt, fled to the duke of Bretagne's court, where he was protected; but such of the assassins as were discovered and seized were executed by order of Charles.

The protection given by the duke of Bretagne to Craon, Charles was, by the constable and his two friends, la Riviere, and falls into de Noviant, represented as an undoubted proof that the duke was privy to the assassination. The duke disclaimed this charge, and even denied that he knew where Craon was; while the dukes of Berry and Burgundy joined in their remonstrances against the king's continuing the preparations he had begun for reducing the duke by force of arms. No representation availed, and Charles ordered a general rendezvous of his army to be held at Mans; but Charles, by this time, from being the most amiable prince of his age, had fallen into a state of insanity, which had been visible to his attendants for some time, though they durst not discover it. It is generally thought that it was the effect of a slow fever, in which he refused to submit to any regimen; and it was thereby converted into lunacy. This is enough to account for the fatal consequences that ensued, without having recourse to the extraordinary, and, in some circumstances, contradictory, incidents, that are said to have followed.

We are told, that Charles, in his march from Mans, being doting, or rather delirious, on horseback, was accosted by a miserable looking wretch, who took hold of his horse's bridle, desired him to stop, because he was betrayed; and then darted into a wood. An accident that soon after happened, of one of his attendants dropping his spear upon the helmet of another, and thereby occasioning a tinkling noise; or, as others say, by one of his gentlemen dropping his sword out of his scabbard, completed the disorder of Charles's brain. He drew his sword, killed the gentleman who had been the unfortunate author of the accident, with three others; and being, perhaps, the strongest man in his dominions, it was with difficulty his phrenzy was overpowered, and he himself carried back to Mans. For two days he lay there in a lethargy, and upon his very imperfect recovery, the dukes of Berry and Burgundy resumed the administration of affairs, to the exclusion of the duke of Orleans, the king's brother, compelled the constable to retire to his estate, and committed the other ministers to the bastile and other prisons.

The two dukes knew how unpopular they were in France, and sought to strengthen themselves by entering into a good correspondence with the court of England, and the duke of Bretagne. They had impeached the ministers, and procured them to be condemned; but before the time appointed for their execution, Charles had a lucid interval, and saved their lives; but his uncles, in a manner, forced them into exile.

Great ascendancy of the dutchess of Orleans. The duke of Orleans, brother to the king, and consequently first prince of the blood, was, upon pretence of his youth, denied all share of the government; but his dutchess, daughter of the duke of Milan, and grand-daughter to king John, by his daughter who had been married to Galeazzo Visconti, had, by her wit, beauty, and address, got an ascendancy over the king, which she retained even in his hours of lunacy, when he was insensible to all his other relations. This rendered her the reigning favourite of the nation; but procured her the hatred of the dutchess of Burgundy; and the mutual dislike between the wives communicating itself to their husbands, gave rise to that fatal difference that ever after subsisted between the houses of Orleans and Burgundy. It must be acknowledged, that nothing could be more flagitious, debauched, or luxurious than the court of France was at this time, or more ignorant, and divided within itself. As a proof of its ignorance, the dutchess of Orleans was publicly accused of having bewitched the king, as her husband had done the queen. The king's misfortune seemed only to open to them a more extensive range for pleasure and diversion. An accident which happened at one of their festal exhibitions, occasioned the king to relapse into his disorder more dangerously than ever.

His lunacy increased by a fatal accident. A masque ball was given by the queen, and the king was one of six, who, in the character of savages, were covered with tow, forming the appearance of hair, that was stuck on by rosin, and consequently very combustible. No body knew who the maskers were, but the graceful appearance of the king made the dutchess of Berry inquisitive who he was, and the dance was stopt. On this, the duke of Orleans sportingly, being ignorant of the materials of his covering, thrust a lighted torch against one of the maskers. The flame in an instant was communicated to them all, and being chained together the king must have perished had not one of the maskers cried out to save him, and the dutchess of Berry then calling to mind his person, stifled the flame, that had seized him, with her robes. Four of the maskers were burnt, and a fifth disentangling himself, was saved by jumping into a cistern of water. It was no wonder if so deplorable an accident increased the king's disease, and settled it into periodical returns of lunacy, which were indicated by heaviness and restlessness the night before they attacked him. The effects, however, were various, for they broke out in the different shapes of childishness, fury, cruelty, melancholy, and other frantic passions; and while he was under their influence he knew none but the dutchess of Orleans. It is not amiss here to observe, that the assiduity of the court to amuse the king at this time, introduced the diversion of cards and card playing, for the invention could could not be older, because we find no mention of them more early than this, in any of the prohibitions or ecclesiastical laws against gaming.

The dukes of Burgundy and Berry knew they were disagreeable to the nation, and therefore they endeavoured to render their government popular. They confined their own and the court expences to the revenues of the royal demesnes, and thereby eased the people of their taxes. They published edicts to check the growth of immorality; they revived the use of manly exercises among the common people, and they paid an unusual deference to the constitution of the parliament, the sessions of which were now become fixt according to the excellent regulations introduced by Charles.

Negotiations with England.

We have, in another place, related the concern which the court of France took in the religious differences of the times; but affairs still continued to be unsettled between France and England. Many negotiations had been begun and broken off; and we find that on the twenty-second of February 1393, a safe conduct was made out at London for the dukes of Berry and Burgundy, with six hundred persons in their retinue, to treat of peace with the dukes of Lancaster and Gloucester.

The king of Navarre, about this time, was treating with Richard concerning the restoration of Cherbourg, formerly mortgaged by his predecessor to Edward for a sum of money, which he offered to repay. The money was acceptable to Richard; the Navarrese claim was judged to be good, and the place was delivered up. Soon after, a general truce was concluded between France and England, by sea and land, for four years. This was introductory to negotiations for a definitive treaty; but in the mean while, Richard's queen died, and the Gascon deputies from Bordeaux petitioned him to resume the grant which he had made to the duke of Lancaster of all that remained to him in the dutchy of Guienne; which that duke accordingly resigned. Richard had as yet no son to succeed him, and the dukes of Lancaster and Burgundy were earnest for his matching into the royal family of France. A negotiation of that kind was accordingly set on foot, but was violently opposed by the dukes of Berry and Orleans, as the king had but one daughter, who was not only not marriageable, but had been engaged to the duke of Bretagne's son.

Charles, in his lucid intervals, and the chancellor of France, seconded the duke of Burgundy in pushing on the match; and they called in to their assistance, a travelling enthusiast, who took the name of Robert the Hermit, and pretended to have a commission from heaven for concluding the marriage. By this man's assistance, all objections to it were removed, and among other articles of the treaty, eight hundred thousand francs were to be paid as the lady's fortune; Richard renounced all claim upon the crown of France, and a truce for twenty-five years was agreed upon between the two kingdoms. This negotiation chiefly employed both courts till the year 1396, when Richard made most magnificent preparations for going to France in person to marry his queen, and to have an interview with Charles. His secret intention in this was to engage that court to support him in case of need against his turbulent subjects, especially the duke of Gloucester, who violently opposed all French connections. To induce the court of France to this, Richard agreed to restore the town of Brest, which, like Cherbourg, had been mortgaged to his grandfather, upon the payment of a hundred and twenty thousand francs of gold by the duke of Bretagne. But this restitution, though agreeable to equity and good faith, was violently exclaimed against by the antigallican party in England. Charles the Noble was then king of Navarre; and the French king gave him the dutchy of Nemours in exchange for Cherbourg, and the other estates he held in Normandy. Richard had, at this time, so much credit with the court of France, that he even procured the pardon of Craon, who returned to his own country and proved a remarkable penitent, and sold his estate, which was very considerable, to make restitution to all he had injured.

How carried on,

The kings of France
declared to be lords of Genoa.

This year, the Genoese, after being torn in pieces by domestic factions, put themselves under the protection of France; and cardinal Flisco, who had the temporary government of that city, sent an embassy to Charles, with the offer of the sovereignty of that republic. The French court, some time before that, had ordered some troops to make a descent upon the Western Riviera, and had formed a strong party among the Genoese nobility. Articles were accordingly drawn up, by which the kings of France were declared lords of Genoa; but the subjects of the republic were to be governed by their own laws; nor had the French kings any power to tax them.

Rebellion
count of Perigord.

This new concluded alliance between Charles and Richard, gave France an opportunity of displaying her importance; but while her influence was gaining ground through all the courts of Europe, a domestic insurrection disturbed her tranquility. The count of Perigord had claims upon several estates in France; all which, in violation of the royal authority, and arrets of parliament, which had passed against him, he seized by force of arms. A body of troops were sent against him under a marshal of France, who beat him, and brought him prisoner to Paris, where he was condemned to lose his head; but his life was saved by the duke of Orleans, who, notwithstanding, took possession of all his vast estate, which had been forfeited to the crown.

The

The court of France, about the same time, had an opportunity of displaying, at once, its valour and generosity. Fatal expedition Sigismund king of Hungary, tho' he had not lived in good of the correspondence with France, was so hardly pressed by Bajazet, French the Turkish sultan, that he sent an humble request to Charles, against begging his assistance against the infidels. The French the Turks. nobly forgot all occasions of offence, and an army was set on foot, consisting of the chief nobility of France, who served at their own expence. Among them was the duke of Nevers, eldest son of the duke of Burgundy, the count de Eu, constable of France, John de Vienne, admiral, the count de la Marche, the famous marshal Boucicaut, with many other noblemen and gentlemen, to the number of two thousand, and a more complete and better appointed army was scarcely ever known to take the field.

To what we have already related of the fate of this ex- See pedition, we are to add, that Froissard, a French author of Vol. VIII. credit, who lived at the time, accuses John Galeazzo, duke p. 65. of Milan, of keeping up a close correspondence with Bajazet, and betraying to him all the secrets of the Christians. The same writer tells us, that Galeazzo's chief quarrel with the French was on account of the treatment his daughter met with at that court on the charge of bewitching the king.

It is generally admitted, that Sigismund, after being joined Their with the French, who were distinguished by the profligacy great loss of their manners, was at the head of a hundred and thirty at the thousand men, and it was owing to the impetuosity of the battle of duke of Nevers, who commanded under him, and the other Nicopolis. French nobility, who claimed the post of honour, and began the charge too early, that the Christians were defeated at Nicopolis, in the greatest and most bloody battle they had ever fought with the infidels. Almost all the French were cut in pieces, excepting the count of Nevers, the marshal Boucicaut, and two or three other great noblemen, whom the barbarians saved on account of their ransoms. The count de Eu died in prison, and the admiral Vienne, was killed on the spot. The sword of constable was bestowed on the marshal de Sancerre; but nothing could equal the odium which the French incurred, by their insolent behaviour in the battle, over all the Christian world. The duke of Nevers was ransomed by his father (who was thought not to have been displeased with that opportunity of renewing the taxations of the public) as were the marshal Boucicaut, and the other prisoners, immense sums being paid for all their ransoms.

Europe was, about the year 1397, in a most extraordinary State of situation. Wenceslaus, emperor of Germany, had been deposed Europe at and confined for being a madman. The king of France was this time. actually lunatic, and Richard II. of England, was more insane than either, by the badness and wickedness of the measures measures he pursued in his government. Wenceslaus, though deposed from the empire, was still king of Bohemia, and had an interview with Charles at Amiens, concerning the means of putting an end to the schism of the church. In consequence of this interview, though Charles was then under a fit of lunacy, both competitors for the popedom were required to resign their pretensions; but neither of them complying, marshal Boucicaut besieged pope Benedict in his palace at Avignon, where he made him a prisoner, and his confinement continued for near five years.

The injustice and tyranny of Richard king of England, had sent the earl of Hereford, who, by the death of his father John of Ghent, became duke of Lancaster, into exile, and he fixed his residence at the court of France, where he held a correspondence with all the discontented of England. The duke kept his design a profound secret from the French minister, but paid a visit to his friend, the duke of Bretagne, and passed over from Vannes, with only fourscore persons in his retinue, to England, where he soon seated himself on the throne by means that are foreign to this part of our history.

Integrity of Cliffon.

After Oliver de Cliffon, the late constable, had been disgraced at the French court, he retired to his own estate in Bretagne, where he defended himself so bravely against the attacks of that duke, that the latter desired a conference with him, and sent his son to Cliffon, as a hostage for his safety. Cliffon agreed to the conference; but carried the young prince with him, and restored him to the arms of his father. This act of magnanimity struck the duke; Cliffon became his friend and favourite ever after, and, at the time of his death, which happened in 1398, he left him guardian to his children. This confidence was the more extraordinary, as Cliffon's son was still the husband of the countess of Penthievre, the heiress of the Blais family. When age and diseases had confined Cliffon to his bed, that lady proposed to him the dispatching out of the world all the late duke's children; but Cliffon reaching at a javelin, which he threw at her, she ran down stairs with such precipitation, that she broke her thigh, and was lame ever after. Her father-in-law nobly discharged the trust the duke had reposed in him, by the education he gave to his eldest ward, who succeeded to his father's dukedom.

German
affairs.

Robert, count palatine of the Rhine, being chosen emperor in place of Wenceslaus, the latter, who had recovered some degree of sanity, applied to the French court, where he was befriended by the duke of Orleans, who bought from him the dutchy of Luxembourg; after which, though he had raised some troops to restore Wenceslaus, he dismissed them, and persuaded that prince to content himself with the possession of Bohemia. Boucicaut, who had signalized himself in defending Constantinople against the infidels, was now returned returned to France, and was followed by Paleologus, emperor of Constantinople, in person, who came to the French court to solicit assistance against Bajazet.

We have already mentioned the defeat and captivity of Vol. VII. that prince, and it is not improbable, that, after Tamerlane p. 438. had subdued Bajazet, he might, as the French writers tell us, have formed a kind of friendship with Charles VI. of France. It does not appear that this prince was then in any capacity of doing business; but his crown received a great addition of strength by the submission of Archebaud de Greilly, brother to the famous captal of Buche, who abandoned the English interest after they had murdered Richard.

The duke of Orleans was now known to be equally and of as avaricious as ambitious, and having, during the absence of the court the duke of Burgundy, while he was visiting his family France. estates, prevailed upon the king, in one of his lucid intervals, to create him lieutenant-general and governor of the realm, as often as his disorder should disable him from the administration of affairs; he imposed a new tax upon the people, and obliged even ecclesiastics to pay it, though the nation was then labouring under a vast scarcity of bread, and all provisions. Upon the return of the duke of Burgundy to Paris, he openly impeached the conduct of the duke of Orleans in parliament, and their heats were on the point of producing a civil war, when the duke of Bourbon persuaded them both to retire from court till the king, upon the next return of his senses, could determine the differences between them, by the advice of his council; whose sense Charles accordingly took, and found it to be in favour of the duke of Burgundy, who was, at this time, popular, on account of the services he performed to the crown.

Henry IV. was then king of England; and upon his ac- A war cession to the throne he had endeavoured to apologize to the with Eng- court of France for his conduct; but his messengers, upon land their landing in France, were ordered not to proceed, and threaten-their herald was imprisoned. Henry was uneasy at the ed.
thoughts of a French war, and had confined the late Richard's virgin wife, as a pledge for her father's behaviour. Charles being then in his senses, resented this, by fomenting a rebellion in Henry's English, as well as French, dominions. But though the Gascons shewed some dispositions to the revolt, they were easily quieted by Henry's lieutenant, the earl of Worcester. The conspirators in England, who had set the young queen at liberty, were likewise subdued and punished, and Henry again obtained the custody of her person; but prized the friendship of Charles so much, that he promised to send her over to her father, with her jewels, equipages, and attendants; upon which the truce with England was confirmed on the twenty-ninth of January 1400. Next year some coldness sprung up between the two courts, on account

count of Charles giving his eldest son the title of duke of Guienne; and Henry refused to refund the young queen's portion, on account of some arrears of king John's ransom, which remained still due from the crown of France; and thus matters continued in a state of suspense between peace and war.

Henry In 1402, king Henry married the dutchess dowager of ess of disappointed in the interested views he had in making the Bretagne. match; for she committed the care of her sons to the duke of Burgundy, who performed a signal service to the French crown by carrying them to Paris, where they received their education. The Bretons disliked the marriage of their dutchess so much, that their privateers infested the coasts of England, and open hostilities went on between the two nations, though their sovereigns pretended to be at peace.

In France, Henry lost the castles of St. Peter, St. Mary, and Newcastle, and mutual recriminations passed between him and the duke of Orleans, who upbraided Henry as being an usurper and a murderer, while Henry charged him with being ambitious and a necromancer. Their quarrel began by the duke invading Guienne, and his reproaching Henry for the ill treatment which he pretended his niece Isabella had received from him while she was in England; and by his patronizing the earl of St. Paul, who adored the memory of Richard, and was therefore Henry's determined enemy.
Mutual challenges passed between them in the most scurrilous terms, and Henry carried his complaints to the court of France both against the duke and the earl. Nothing but the jarring interests of the dukes of Burgundy and Orleans could have prevented the English, at this time, from being entirely expelled from France.

Hostilities Upon the death of the constable Sancerre, that sword was, ciled to his person, that they petitioned Charles to continue him in his command. The influence of the duke of Orleans over the king, and in all public affairs, was now strengthened, by an indecent intimacy he had cultivated with the queen, and which enabled him to gratify his avarice to the utmost. He was constantly opposed by the duke of Bur- gundy, who professed himself a patriot. After many negotiations, a seeming reconciliation was effected between them, and it was resolved that each should put himself at the head of a great army; that Orleans should command in Guienne, where he was to besiege Bordeaux, and the duke of Burgundy in Picardy, where he was to besiege Calais.

They

They were encouraged to this by the late progress of the French arms under the earl of St. Paul, and other generals in those provinces. Accordingly, both of them took the field, and both were unsuccessful. The duke of Orleans, after losing six thousand of his troops in some ineffectual operations, returned to Paris; and the duke of Burgundy complaining that he was ill supplied with money, abandoned the siege of Calais; but the truth is, both of them hastened back to court to support their several interests there.

On the twenty-seventh of April 1404, Philip duke of Burgundy, surnamed the Hardy, died at Hall, in Hainault, as he was going to take possession of the dutchy of Brabant, in the name of his second son. Notwithstanding the vast revenues he enjoyed, he spent them by the magnificence of his living; his personal estate was divided among his creditors, and he was succeeded, as duke of Burgundy, by his eldest son, John count of Nevers. The queen and the duke of Orleans looked upon his death as the most fortunate event that could have happened to them; and his son having neither his popularity nor experience, they found it not very difficult to exclude him from all share of the government. Their unpopularity, however, was such, that the queen secretly sent great sums of money to Germany, as a provision in case she was obliged to leave France; and the duke thought of nothing but amassing a vast estate that might protect him against his enemies, without even paying his debts.

Charles all this while continued in a miserable situation Distress of both in body and mind. Sometimes perceiving his frenzy Charles recurring upon him, he would call out to his attendants to and his take his dagger from his side, because he would die rather family. than hurt the meanest of his subjects. While the queen and the duke of Orleans were maintaining splendid courts, the king and his children were kept without the means of a decent subsistence. The goodness of that unhappy prince's heart, however, never left him when he had the use of his reason. In one of his intervals he sent for the governess of one of his children, and finding all he had heard of the mean condition in which they were kept to be true; he gave her a gold cup out of which he drank, to provide them food, saying, with a sigh, that state was ridiculous when necessaries were wanting. Being then sensible of the wrongs that had been done him, and his family, he ordered the princes of the blood to be summoned to his council. The dukes of Burgundy, Berry, and Bourbon, with the kings of Navarre, and Sicily, accordingly attended, and all of them condemned the conduct of the queen, and the duke of Orleans. The duke retired to Melun; but was persuaded by the duke of Burgundy to return, and, after a great many bickerings, bickerings, it was agreed, that during the king's illness, or absence, as it was called, the care of the government should be committed to a council of state. This compromise did not long continue, and the dukes of Burgundy and Orleans renewed their family animosities with more heat than ever. Though both of them had grossly insulted the duke of Berry, their uncle, yet he effected a reconciliation between them, and both of them swore, at the altar, an eternal friendship and unity for the future. Three days after this solemn act had passed, the duke of Orleans was, in the evening, called to attend the king, and as he was riding on his mule to the Hotel de St. Pol, where Charles resided, he was surrounded by assassins, one of whom, with a pole-axe, cut off his hand, and upon his calling out that he was the duke of Orleans, another cleft his scull, and left him dead. One of the four servants who attended him was likewise murdered in endeavouring to save his master.

The assassins having escaped, the author of the murder was unknown, and the duke of Burgundy assisted openly at the funeral of the deceased. The council of state, after this, sent for the provost of Paris to know what progress he had made in the discovery of the murderers; upon which, he demanded liberty to search the houses of the members of the council. The duke of Burgundy was, by the king of the Two Sicilies, observed to turn pale at this request. He confessed to that king and the duke of Berry, that the assassination had been committed by his order, and he hastily left the assembly with only five attendants; and though the admiral offered to pursue and take him, he was restrained by the council. The duke of Bourbon, who seems to have been the only man of virtue about the court, ashamed of so flagitious a pusillanimity, left Paris, and retired to a private life, while the duke of Burgundy openly justified the murder, and raised forces. He was too powerful to submit to make any apology for what he had done. He raised troops to support himself against all the pursuits of justice, and rejected the applications of the other princes of the blood, who were shamefully forward in offering their assistance to compromise matters, to sue for the pardon which he thought he could command. He marched to Lorraine at the head of his army, obliged the king to give him an audience, but offered no other vindication of his conduct but that of blackening the memory of the late duke of Orleans, which he did by the mouth of one Dr. John Petit. His force was superior to all that the king and the other princes of the blood could raise. They withdrew with indignation and grief; and the duke, who was now in possession of the king's person, not only obtained a full and free pardon, but the removal of the admiral and other great officers whom he disliked.

The

The opposition of the people of Liege to John of Bavaria, Vol. IX. who had been recommended by pope Gregory for their p. 49. bishop, obliged the duke of Burgundy to leave Paris; upon which the queen of France, and the princes of the blood, returned to court, and upon the appearance of the dutchess dowager, and the young duke of Orleans, a formal process was instituted against the duke of Burgundy, by which his pardon was declared to be of no effect, and he himself a traitor to his country.

The duke of Burgundy having subdued all opposition in and carried the bishopric of Liege, returned with his victorious army towards Paris. The queen and the princes of the blood before him, being in no condition to give him battle, retired to Tours, and carried along with them the person of the king. The duke of Burgundy then entered into a negotiation with the court; but the latter insisted on his making a public submission to the king, and upon his not coming near his person for some years. The duke rejected those terms with great haughtiness, and proceeded with his army to Paris, from whence he sent offers of a general submission to the king, and of his desire to live in friendship with the family of Orleans, and that, too, expressed by the mouth of another person. The duke of Burgundy was so powerful, and had so many friends both at Paris and at court, where the dutchess dowager, his chief prosecutor, now died of grief, that those terms, inadequate as they were to his offence, were accepted of. The friends of both sides sealed their reconciliation with oaths and other engagements; and the young duke of Orleans having lately married the virgin queen dowager of England, his brother, the duke of Vertus, was married to the duke of Burgundy's daughter, with an immense fortune; and the court returned to Paris.

The duke of Burgundy had all this while, in imitation of A powerful his father, professed to act upon the most patriotic principles, and the queen being somewhat too unguarded with federacy regard to the licentiousness of the soldiery, he had gained formed a vast number of friends in Paris, and all over France. The against murdered duke of Orleans was, notwithstanding all his him. faults and vices, thought to be the finest gentleman that kingdom ever had produced, and yet the public would have pardoned his murder had the duke of Burgundy expressed a proper sense of his guilt by repentance and acknowledgments. The haughty, imperious, manner of his proceeding soon lost him many friends. The people looked upon majesty as being in distress, and pitied it. All the amiable qualities of the late duke of Orleans were remembered; his vices were forgotten; and in a short time the duke of Burgundy had little to trust to but his army, and his forming new intrigues for the support of his interest. Upon his return with the court to Paris, he applied to the duke of Berry, and the king of Navarre, who had each of them great great reasons of complaint against the court, and brought them over to his party.

The queen perceiving how well the duke of Burgundy had succeeded with the princes of the blood, withdrew to Melun, and carried the king along with her; and the duke of Burgundy laid hold of that opportunity to establish a popular commission to reform the abuses of the treasury. In the course of this affair, great discoveries were pretended to have been made against Montague, and he was put to the rack, where he said all that was dictated to him by his accusers. Even that could not save his life, and he was beheaded; but not before he had recanted all that he had confessed, and justified the memory of the late duke of Orleans. His death was considered by all the impartial part of the French, as a shocking act of tyranny, and the sentence of his condemnation was afterwards reversed; but it is remarkable, that though his daughters were married to some of the greatest subjects of France, though one of his brothers was archbishop of Sens, and chancellor of the kingdom, and another archbishop of Paris, yet the reversal of his sentence was owing to the gratitude of a convent he had founded, the members of which sold their plate to defray the expence.

Though his chief crime was his attachment to the queen, yet both she, and her brother the duke of Bavaria, shared in the plunder, and a new reconciliation between her and the duke of Burdundy took place. The reconciled parties endeavoured to strengthen this coalition by some popular acts. The Parisians were restored to their full privileges; but they declined to be entrusted with the power of re-establishing the militia, for the abuse of which they had already so severely smarted. Plans of public œconomy were resumed, a reduction upon pensions, and other useless expences of government, took place, and the administration made preparations for renewing the war with England.

The duke of Burgundy, thinking now that he had nothing to apprehend from his enemies at home, gave way to that measure, especially as he wanted to drive the English from the neighbourhood of Artois. Henry of England, had the address to draw off the duke of Bretagne, between whom and the family of Penthièvre differences were again broken out; but he was alarmed when he heard that a war with England was the price of the duke of Burgundy's new cemented alliances, alliances, and that his preparations were in such forwardness at St. Omer, that he was ready to besiege Calais. This The intention was defeated by Henry, for he engaged a French French prisoner, a native of St. Omer, to burn the magazines there, magazines which he effectually did. About this time, an English fleet, at St. on board of which was lord Nevil, seneschal of Guienne, Omer was taken by French privateers and carried into Harfleur; burnt, by and the duke of Bretagne found himself so unpopular by his which the introducing English troops for his support, that he petition- siege of ed Henry to recall them, and arbitrators were chosen to Calais is make up all differences between him and the count of Pen- prevent- thievre. The severity of Boucicaut's government, had, about ed. this time, so exasperated the Genoese, that they had taken up arms, and massacred all the French they met with, and chose the marquis of Montferrat for their governor, during the absence of Boucicaut, at Milan; so that the French interest was now entirely ruined in Genoa.

So many untowardly events disgusted the French at the The duke of Burgundy, whom they considered as their author; duke of so that he found it necessary to procure an additional Burgundy strength to his administration. A great council was held in gains the presence of the king, in which it was resolved, that during guardian- his majesty's indisposition, all acts of government should be ship of the carried on in the dauphin's name, who was yet too young dauphin. for the management of affairs in person; but he had been contracted to the duke of Burgundy's daughter. The disposal of the guardianship of the dauphin became now a capital object; and the duke of Berry, whose opinion the king first asked, recommended the duke of Burgundy for that trust, to which he was accordingly appointed. This was a The con- prodigious disappointment to the duke of Berry, who little federates expected that the other members would agree to such an against increase of the duke of Burgundy's power, already too for- him take midable; and he withdrew from Paris. He was followed the field. by the duke of Orleans, whose wife, the queen dowager of England, was lately dead, and by the duke of Bourbon; and it was resolved to check the duke of Burgundy's power, and to revive the process against him for murdering the duke of Orleans. The duke of Bretagne being sounded, joined the same party out of hatred to the duke of Burgundy; as did the kings of Navarre, and the Two Sicilies, with the counts of Alençon, Armagnac, and Clermont; but this confederacy suffered an irreparable loss by the death of the duke of Bourbon, which happened at this time. He seems to have been the only great man in France who retained his virtue and integrity to the last; and, by protecting a lord of Beaujeu against a count of Savoy, he added to his patrimonial estates Dombes, and Beaujolois.

Every thing now portended a civil war to France; but A short the duke of Burgundy had the advantage, by being in posses- accommo- sion of the persons of the king and the dauphin. He issued dation orders effected, orders in the king's name, prohibiting all his subjects to take arms without his authority; and Charles, with his own hand, invited the duke of Berry to appear unattended at court. He offered to comply, but with the express condition that the duke of Burgundy should likewise dismiss his army, which he was so far from doing, that finding the Parisians refractory to his measures, he poured his troops into the capital, and having seized Melun, and the strong passes near Paris, he obliged the queen to throw herself into the arms of the Parisians, though eight thousand of his soldiers were quartered in their city. Charles, at this time, had the use of his reason, and seeing his kingdom in danger of being deluged by blood, he exerted himself so far as to employ his queen as a mediator between both parties, which the duke of Burgundy, (who could not subdue the spirit of the Parisians) agreed to; but in the mean time, he strengthened himself by an alliance with the king of England, who prevailed upon the duke of Bretagne to declare for a neutrality. The duke of Berry was advanced with the confederate army as far as Chastres, when the royal authority prevailed with both parties to agree to a treaty at Bicestre, which was accordingly signed; and it imported, that all parties should desist from their intentions, dismiss their armies, and that the king, who continued still in his senses, should appoint a new administration.

The public foresaw that this accommodation would be of no long continuance. A new administration was, indeed, appointed; its members affected to act upon the most disinterested principles; and the duke of Burgundy had retired to his own estates, where he was always sure of commanding a strong army. The duke of Orleans refused to execute the terms of the late treaty, and the duke of Berry declared he would have no farther concern in public affairs; upon which, the duke of Orleans becoming head of the confederate princes, insisted upon having satisfaction for his father's murder, and omitted no means by which he could strengthen his party. The duke of Burgundy, now secure, by his late alliance with England, complained of this to Charles; and the duke of Berry, and the queen resumed her office of mediation. The duke of Burgundy insisted upon the duke of Berry being removed from his government of Paris, which he accordingly was, and the count of St. Paul substituted in his place. The duke of Orleans, full of heat, knew the queen to be in her heart an irreconcilable enemy to his opponent, and he not only refused to submit to any terms of arbitration, but sent a challenge to the duke of Burgundy, attended by a declaration of war drawn up in the most bitter terms. The duke of Burgundy behaved with so much moderation upon this, that he regained some degree of popularity, especially when when it was known that he had prevailed with the court of England to renew the truce between the two nations.

No hopes of an accommodation now remaining, the Paris Divisions declared themselves on the side of the Burgundians; and the Armagnacs, (for so the other party was called,) were ordered to leave Paris under pain of death. The count of the Paris, St. Paul, the new governor, was entirely in the duke of Burgundy's interest, and formed a guard of five hundred of the most hardy ruffians he could find about Paris, who were employed in hanging, murdering, or burning, all the Armagnacs who fell in their way. In a few days Paris became one great slaughter house. The Armagnacs, so called from the count of that name, who was father to the duke of Orleans's new wife, wore, by way of distinction, a white scarf, with a St. George's cross; and the Burgundians, who were sometimes called Cabochines, from one Caboche, wore a red scarf with a St. Andrew's cross. The duke of Orleans still continuing to advance towards Paris, while the duke of Burgundy remained in Flanders waiting for the English auxiliaries stipulated by the late treaty, the dauphin invited the duke of Burgundy to march to the protection of the king, and the royal family. The arrival of the English auxiliaries which happened at this time, shook the credit of the duke of Burgundy with all parties; but the violence of the duke of Orleans soon re-established it; and the duke of Burgundy gained a clear majority in the king's council. Upon receiving the invitation of the dauphin, he was instantly at the head of sixty thousand regular, well appointed, troops. By his letters he reconciled the council to his English auxiliaries, and accused the duke of Orleans and his faction of an intention to depose the king and usurp his throne.

But though the duke of Burgundy was thus secure of his interest in France, and though his party had murdered all who durst oppose them in Paris, his own army, which was composed of different nations, was by no means united. His Flemings and Picards had quarrelled about the plunder of Ham, a town which he had taken on his march, and both of them insisted upon the liberty of returning home, because the time of their service was now expired. Their defection saved the duke of Orleans, who had placed his last refuge in the event of a battle, and had with that view advanced as far as Montdidier; while the duke of Burgundy having now only the small band of his English auxiliaries to trust to, could only throw a reinforcement of troops into Paris, and then returned to Artois; upon his departure, the duke of Orleans took St. Dennis, and St. Cloud, and even formed the blockade of Paris. Montague, the archbishop of Sens, whom we have already mentioned, having come to the knowledge of the connections between Henry and the duke of Burgundy, represented them, by the writings he published, published, as tending to overthrow the independency of France, which the duke had sold to Henry; and those papers, with the ravages committed at the gates of Paris by the Armagnac party, turned the tide of popularity once more against the Burgundians. That duke seeing himself in danger of ruin, applied himself to the English auxiliaries, who, under all the disadvantages that can be well imagined in an enemy's country, generously followed him, where his own subjects had abandoned him, and he entered Paris, to the great joy of his party there. Next day the English took the posts of Montmartre, and La Chapelle, (which gave the Burgundians a vast idea of their valour) and afterwards forced the post of St. Cloud, the most important of any the duke of Orleans had, with so prodigious a slaughter, that he withdrew his army to Pont Argis, and left his baggage to be plundered by the English; and thus, the duke of Burgundy, once more, got possession of the court and capital of France. He bought from the English their prisoners, with an intention to put them to death, but the duke of Orleans threatened to make reprisals upon the count de la Marche, and a great body of Burgundians whom he had surprized.

takes the person.

About the seventeenth of January 1412, Charles, who had been frantic all the while the blockade of Paris lasted, recovered his senses so well, that he put himself at the head of his troops to march against the dukes of Orleans and Berry, who had again joined the Armagnacs. The duke of Burgundy prevailed with him to give the sword of constable to the count of St. Paul, the most determined enemy the Lancaster family had in France. He had required his English auxiliaries to put their French prisoners to death, but they disdained his command; and he thought himself now so secure, that he neglected paying them their arrears. This coming to the ears of the Armagnacs, they offered Henry restitution of the duchy of Aquitain, if he would befriend them. Henry did not discourage their advances, and managed so between both parties, by enjoining his subjects to observe a strict neutrality, that he was actually, for some time, master of the fate of France. The duke of Burgundy, who was treating with Henry at the same time, came to the knowledge of the offers that had been made by his adversaries, and discovered them to Charles, who was so exasperated at the Armagnacs, that he ordered the oriflamme to be taken from the church of St. Dennis, and carried before him, as a signal for all his subjects to follow him, and to fall upon the English possessions. This determined Henry upon the party he was to take, and on the eighteenth of May he finished his agreement with the dukes of Orleans, and Berry, and the other confederated princes. This treaty was of a very extraordinary nature, and very inconsistent with their subjection to Charles, though several of its articles contained Orleans salvos for their allegiance. Henry was thereby to be put in full possession of Aquitain; the princes engaged to serve him with all their castles, treasures and estates, and entered into the like engagements for their friends, and dependents, who they said consisted of the chief nobility, clergy, and merchants of France. But the following is the most remarkable article of this treaty, for it provides, "That the princes shall offer their sons, daughters, nephews, and all their relations, or others, over whom they have any influence, to be placed in marriage according to the king of England's direction."

Henry, on the other hand promised to defend the said princes as his faithful vassals and subjects (meaning we suppose) because many of them had possessions in Aquitain; and he farther engaged not to make peace with the duke of Burgundy, or any of that party, without their participation. The troops he promised to furnish consisted of one thousand men at arms, and three thousand archers, which, with their followers, who attended them to the field, amounted to a force of above eight thousand men, all of them commanded by Henry's son, the duke of Clarence, who was attended by the duke of York, the lord high admiral of England. Henry appears to have had this expedition greatly at heart, for he made vast additions to it before its departure.

The confederate princes having some dependence on a party they had formed in the duke of Burgundy's army, had shut themselves up in Bourges, where they were besieged by the king. In a desperate sally, they had almost made themselves master of his person, by the intelligence they had with some of his domestics, but being disappointed, the siege went on with amazing vigour, and the place was defended with equal obstinacy. The duke of Orleans was not within Bourges; but the duke of Berry, who had effected a kind of neutrality, had credit enough, to set on foot a negotiation, which was soon concluded, and the princes within Bourges engaged not only to return to their allegiance, but to renounce their connections with England. The French loved their king, and notwithstanding all the divisions among the princes of the blood, the nation was passionately fond of peace, especially as their dissensions were now introducing an enemy, who might soon become their master. The treaty of Bourges therefore being sealed, acceded to by the duke of Orleans and ratified, filled the nation with inexpressible transports of joy; and in a few days no remains of its late distraction appeared, but instead of that, all true Frenchmen united to expel the English; all marks of distinction were abolished, and all differences done away under the most solemn oaths.

While the treaty of Bourges was negotiating, the English and troops were in full march to raise the siege; but were bandon amazed when they heard that they had been abandoned by the English. The late reconciliation had opened all the secrets of the negotiation with England and the duke of Burgundy; and to give the English troops a diversion, he had ordered his Flemish subjects to invade Guienne, which they flatly refused to do on account of their attachment to England. The duke of Clarence landed in Normandy, heard of the defection of the princes, entered upon hostilities with the French, but his men being disappointed of their pay by the duke of Orleans, raised it by military execution upon the inhabitants, and they lived at free quarter upon that duke's estate. The dauphin called out for moderation, and refused to assist in driving the English out by force.

An assembly of the states was held, at which the duke of Orleans assisted, and the general sense of the nation was, that the confederate princes who had invited in the English, should pay them. They were unable. The nation was both enervated and exhausted; the peace of Bourges awakened it to a sense of all its miseries, and the late unanimity was again converted into bitter discontent; but in the mean time, Henry IV. died, and was succeeded by his son, Henry V. who seemed to be born for the destruction of France.

Reformation of the French
government.

The assembly of the states appears, at this time, to have been sitting, and the public finances as well as spirit being at the lowest ebb, the dauphin laid hold of the helm of government, which the other princes did not now think worthy of contending for. As œconomy is the most popular of all principles under a new administration, the state of the finances was examined. D'Essards, who had managed them ever since the death of Montague, was accused of having embezzled two millions of crowns, for which he not only produced the duke of Burgundy's receipts, but informed the other princes of a design which that duke had of destroying the dukes of Berry, Orleans, and Bourbon. The dauphin gave D'Essards an order to secure the city of Paris, and this order was countersigned by the duke of Burgundy, who had intelligence that his destruction was resolved upon. D'Essards took possession of the bastile, but the duke, by this time, had leisure to prepare and muster his party, and they besieged the bastile with a fury that indicated the destruction of the government.

Insolence
of the Burgun-dians.

The dauphin found the duke of Burgundy too powerful in Paris to be subdued, and he applied to him to quell the popular commotions. The duke affected great concern, though it was visible that two of his partizans, Simon de Caboché, and John de Troye, were the immediate authors of the disturbances, together with some Flemish deputies, the duke's subjects, who were then at Paris. D'Essards was persuaded by the duke to give up the bastile, but, contrary to the promise of pardon given him, he lost his head upon the scaffold, bewailing the share he had in the death of his predecessor Montague. After his execution the rabble put no bounds to their fury. They broke into the dauphin's dauphin's palace, put some of his domestics to death, seized upon the duke of Bar, obliged the king, who happened to be then in his senses, to go to the parliament, and there register edicts of their own drawing; and forced the dauphin, with the dukes of Berry, and Guienne, to wear white hoods, which happened then to be the livery of their party.

The more those rebels were gratified, their insolence en- who are creased. They deposed the chancellor of France; they driven out filled up the great places with their own creatures; and of Paris:
Helion de Jâqueville, whom they chose for their leader, hearing some music in the dauphin's apartments, broke into them, put his attendants in danger of their lives, and insulted himself; while the duke of Burgundy, who was present, carried his dissimulation so far as to whisper to him not to seem to be afraid. These violences however, were not abetted by all the people of Paris, where the king and dauphin had a strong party. The dauphin privately wrote to the dukes of Orleans and Bretagne, and they with other princes had a meeting at Verneuil, where they agreed to march to the king's relief with an army. This resolution was no sooner published, than it appeared that the Burgundians or Cabochines, formed but an inconsiderable party of the Parisians. The loyalists drove them to their quarters, where many of them were killed, and the survivors escaped to Flanders. The dukes of Bavaria and Bar, who were prisoners, were set at liberty; and the duke of Burgundy having failed in a design that he had formed for carrying off the king's person, found he could no longer dissemble, and fled to Flanders likewise.

All this while, the English, with the duke of Clarence at Hostilities their head, remained in Guienne; and the duke of Orleans between had been obliged to give up his brother to the duke of AIN- France

between the two nations; and Henry, who was well acquainted with the divisions and distresses of France, threatened to renew the claim of Edward III. to the crown of France in his own person, if the treaty of Bretigni, the breaches of which he complained of, and indeed with great reason, was not punctually executed; at the same time, he sent his brother, the duke of York, to Paris, to demand the king's daughter, the princess Catharine, in marriage.

By the retreat of the duke of Burgundy to Flanders, the The duke French government had, at this time, recovered some kind of Bar- of consistency. Paris, the bastille, and the louvre, were gundy in possession of the dukes of Berry, Bavaria, and Bar. The marches demand of the princess Catharine by the duke of York; was against considered as a favourable omen of Henry having given over Paris, but all thoughts of matching into the Burgundy family; while is forced that duke found himself so universally detested, that he sent to retreat deputies with apologies for his conduct to Paris; but they had

had a strict charge to have an eye upon the state of the court; and privately to assure his friends, that he was raising an army for the deliverance of the king and the dauphin, who, as he pretended, had applied to him to free them from the thralldom they were suffering under the princes. In this last assertion, he was so confident, that the best friends of the royal family, and even the princes of the blood themselves were startled; so that after he had raised a great army, he marched without resistance to the very gates of Paris, which he summoned to surrender in the name of the king and the dauphin. The king was then in one of his fits of lunacy, and the queen convoked a grand council, at which some of the chief Parisians assisted, to deliberate upon an answer to the manifesto that had been published by the duke of Burgundy, affirming that the king and the dauphin had invited him to their relief. There seems to have been some ground for this charge against the dauphin, whose conduct was condemned by the principal members of the assembly. He was obliged to write letters to the duke of Burgundy, requiring him to lay down his arms, and publicly to disavow all correspondence and connection with him. For once Charles and his administration acted with steadiness. They procured an ample condemnation of the tract that had been written by Dr. Petit, justifying the murder of the duke of Orleans. The princes of the blood took their turns in their rounds about the works of the city, the defence of which was committed to the count of Armagnac; and both the king, who was now recovered, and the dauphin, acted with surprizing spirit and resolution. The count of Armagnac treated the duke of Burgundy's summons to surrender with the utmost contempt, and such measures were taken as prevented the duke's party within the city from rising in his favour.

The French
king takes the field against
him.

This was a prodigious disappointment to the duke, who having thrown garrisons into Compeigne, Soissons, and St. Dennis, returned to Flanders. Upon his retreat, the royal party let loose all their rage against him. Charles published a manifesto relating to all the circumstances of his brother's murder, declaring him a traitor, and requiring the assistance of all his good subjects to bring him to justice. He then took the field at the head of a very fine army, reduced Compeigne, and Soissons, where he ordered two of the duke's favourites to be publicly executed as traitors; and he was advancing towards Artois, when the duke's brother and sister threw themselves at his feet, as mediators for their brother. The behaviour of Charles on this occasion was unexceptionable. He declared himself ready to grant the duke a pardon if he sued for it in a proper manner; and he wrote to the states of Flanders, demanding to know, whether they intended to abet their duke in his rebellion.

Their

Their answer was, “That the duke might pursue what course he pleased, but that they were stedfastly resolved to continue loyal subjects to the crown of France.” This unwillingness in the states of Flanders, was the true cause of the duke of Burgundy’s submission; and though he was then treating with the king of England for support, he was obliged to accept of peace upon the king’s terms. The dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, with the archbishop of Sens, made some difficulty in signing the treaty; but they were at last compelled to do it by the king, and the dauphin, who passionately desired to see an end of the civil commotions of France.

The behaviour of the duke of York, while he was in Negotia-Paris, made the French court suspect that he had some-thing farther in view than to demand the princess Catharine for his brother; and this was confirmed by a ten years France truce entered into between the king of England and the duke and Eng-land of Bretagne, and another truce between Henry and the crown of Castile. Henry, who was now determined on a war with France, secretly resolved to support the duke of Burgundy; but being little prepared for so great an enterprize, he miscarry. but amused the French ambassadors with negotiations for a peace. The archbishop of Bourges, and the constable d’Albert, with other noblemen, were then ambassadors at his court; but though they readily agreed to his receiving the princess Catharine in marriage with a great fortune, he insisted upon the immediate execution of the treaty of Bretigni being made the basis of the negotiation; and all that the ambassadors could do, was to prolong the late truce to the twenty-second of February 1415.

Upon the meeting of the English parliament, though Henry had just before sent a most splendid embassy to France, the members addressed him for a war with that kingdom. The advantages the French ministry gained over the duke of Burgundy, had not prevented the English ambassadors from insisting not only upon the execution of the treaty of Bretigni, but adding a vast tract of territory between the Somme and Graveline, with half the county of Provence, to Henry’s French dominions; and likewise that he should receive with the princess Catharine two millions of crowns. The French offered him all that part of Aquitain that he possessed, the counties of Aginois, Perigord, Bigorre, Xantoigne, Rovergne, with a great number of other provinces and towns, provided he would remit the arrears due for king John’s ransom; and accept of six hundred thousand crowns as the portion of the princess. Though those terms were rejected, yet Henry continued the negotiation that he might gain time; and after many fruitless conferences, the English ambassadors returned by the way of Harfleur; and a new embassy was sent from France to England, with the archbishop of Bourges, a hot violent man, at its head. By this time, Henry had completed.

completed his preparations for invading France; but he received the new ambassadors with vast magnificence at Winchester. The English ministry finding they had nothing new to propose, treated them with such contempt, that the archbishop of Bourges fell into a kind of frenzy, and forgetting what was due to Henry or himself, he reproached him as an usurper; upon which, all negotiations breaking off, Henry sent a defiance to Charles, by Cantelope, king at arms, which was answered by a tun of tennis balls sent him by the dauphin; to which Henry made the memorable reply, "That he would play such balls against Paris as all her battlements could not rebound."

Henry
invades France,
and takes Harfleur.

No time was now lost in each party entering upon hostilities in Picardy, where the earl of Warwick was governor of Calais; and Henry, in August, 1415, landed at Caux, in Normandy, and besieged Harfleur. His army consisted of thirty-six thousand men; and he was observed by another under the constable d'Albort; who had orders, by no means, to hazard a general action. Harfleur was so vigorously battered by Henry's heavy artillery, for thirty days, that, after various attempts to relieve it, it capitulated to surrender, if not relieved by a certain time. According to some authors, Henry took the place sword in hand, cut in pieces all the garrison but a few, and gave the town up to be plundered by his soldiers. So barbarous a proceeding, however, is very unlike the general tenor of Henry's government at this time; for he affected to treat the French as his natural born subjects; and he obliged his troops to observe a very strict discipline: but it is certain that he planted Harfleur, after taking it, with an English colony.

The taking of Harfleur struck France with consternation; and it was resolved to act no longer on the defensive, as Henry now openly proclaimed himself a competitor for the crown. All the princes of the blood took the field under the constable, who was joined by a detachment of the duke of Burgundy's troops; twelve thousand Bretons; and, according to some accounts, by fifty thousand Lorrainers. In short, troops poured in so fast from every hand, that the constable and the princes refused to enlist any more; and sent back six thousand Parisians who came to offer their service to the king.

situation,

Henry was, at this time, in a most melancholy situation: he had lost the flower of his troops, by a bloody flux, before Harfleur; occasioned by their drinking new wines and the rainy season setting in: he therefore resolved to return to Calais by land. This was judged to be almost impracticable, but insisted upon by Henry, who left three thousand men in Harfleur, and set out on his march for Calais with about twenty thousand men in three divisions. The march, as had been foreseen, was extremely difficult and dangerous; but, though the French had thrown all the impediments they could could in his way, he passed the Somme, and arrived at Blagny; where he perceived the French army consisted of one hundred and twenty thousand men, drawn up between him and Calais, near the village of Agincourt; and his handful of troops, in a manner, surrounded on all sides.

The French were so sure of conquest, that the most forward of them had already, in their own minds, disposed of the royal prisoners who were to fall into their hands; while the constable, and the most experienced of their generals, gave their opinion against fighting; because, by continuing to straighten Henry's army, and cutting off his provisions, they thought it must surrender of course. The constable took the sense of a council of war, where it was carried for fighting by a vast majority; but having received strict orders from the king, who was at Rouen, attended by the dauphin and the duke of Berry, not to hazard a battle, he transmitted the resolutions of the council thither; where they were confirmed, and he had positive orders to fight. Upon this the constable made such a disposition of his army, that it was impossible for Henry to proceed without a battle. In other respects, his conduct was injudicious; for the field he chose was so narrow, that he could extend his front line but a very little way beyond that of Henry; who undoubtedly thought himself ruined, as the front of the French was supported by two other lines, each of which was more than double all the English army. He offered to restore Harfleur, and to pay the expences of the war, if he was suffered to proceed to Calais; but, contrary to the advice of the soundest heads among the French, the terms were rejected, and there was now no appeal but to the sword. The constable made use of some discretionary orders he had received for delaying the engagement as long as he was able; and nothing could have so effectually befriended Henry as the ardour of the dukes of Bourbon and Alençon for fighting, because the bloody flux continued to make great havoc in his army.

Authors differ widely as to the number of the French army; some making them sixty thousand men, and others feats the double that number: but the difference is easily reconciled, French when we reflect that the French took into their account of in the fa- foldiers only such as were completely armed; which was not mous bat- the case with their common infantry, who were gene- tle of rally brought into the field rather for parade than use; and Agincourt. it is allowed, that, of the twenty-two thousand men which the English army consisted of, above one third were ill of the bloody flux. The constable received fresh orders, countermanding his venturing a battle; and Henry found himself under a necessity of being the aggressor, by attacking the French. The French lords were so eager for glory and conquest, that, regardless of all discipline, they posted themselves in the front line; so that the second and third lines remained almost without officers. Henry depended upon his archers, who were posted, under the duke of York, to the right of his main body, which was commanded by himself, as the rear line was by the duke of Exeter, his flanks being secured by two woods. The French, as Henry had foreseen, depended on their cavalry; and the English archers, who were to begin the attack, were provided with sharp stakes, in the nature of chevaux de frize, to prevent the approach of the horses. At the same time he ambushed a body of his best archers and cavalry in the woods on his flank. He then marched, with the greatest alacrity, to the attack. It was begun by a deadly discharge of English arrows; which did such execution, that the front line of the French was driven back on their second line; and the disorder of both was increased by the English archers breaking in upon them with their swords and battle-axes. The duke of Alençon, who commanded the second line of the French, soon repaired their disorder; and the battle becoming general, he killed the duke of York with his own hand, and fought for some time singly with Henry, who killed two of his domestics, and would have given him quarter, upon his calling out that he was the duke of Alençon, had not the English, enraged at their king's danger, dispatched him on the spot. His death was attended by a total rout of the first and second lines of the French, the third line retiring from the field.

While Henry was driving before him the body of reserve, part of the first and second lines formed themselves; and, being joined by the numerous scullions and retainers of the French camp, they began to plunder that of the English. Henry thought, or pretended to think, that this was done by a fresh body of French, and that he must fight a new battle. He therefore ordered all his prisoners, who were now more numerous than his own army, to be massacred on the spot, and was obeyed.

Loss on both sides. In this battle of Agincourt, the loss of the French fell chiefly upon their princes, nobles, and gentlemen of distinction; eight thousand of whom were killed, with not above two thousand of an inferior rank. Among the dead were the constable d'Albret, and Chatillon, admiral of France; the dukes of Alençon, Brabant, and Bar; the duke of Lorraine's brother, the archbishop of Sens, and an hundred and twenty lords carrying banners. The dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the marshal Boucicaut, with many other persons of the highest distinction, were taken prisoners, with two thousand knights and about fourteen thousand common men, notwithstanding the slaughter of the other prisoners.

The loss of the English consisted of about seventeen hundred men killed; among whom were the duke of York, the young duke of Suffolk, and a brave Welsh knight, one David Gam.

The consternation of the French court, which still remained at Rouen, and of the Parisians, was great, in proportion portion as their hopes had been sanguine, when the news of this defeat reached them ; but Henry was far from thinking that this victory put him out of danger. The duke of Bretagne was still in the field with an army superior to that of the English, and had been joined by all the French who escaped from the battle. As Henry expected every moment to be attacked, he obliged his men to destroy great part of their plunder ; but so dispirited were the French by their defeat, that he reached Calais without loss.

By this time, Charles was returned to Paris, and received, from the duke of Burgundy, a deputation, demanding an audience, he himself advancing to the capital with a large body of horse. The deputies were roughly treated by the dauphin, who sent them back with a command to the duke of Burgundy, that he should disband his men. Soon after their departure, the dauphin, who was married to the duke of Burgundy's daughter, and was now nineteen years of age, died of a dysentery ; occasioned, as some thought, by poison, administered to him by his father-in-law ; or, as others think, by his own vices ; being tall and robust, and immoderately given to wine and women.

 privileges which were denied him when he came to England.
 He thought of obliging Henry to make peace with the French king, but was treated with great contempt ; upon which, he offered to assist him in his claim upon the crown of France, if Henry would promise to restore to the empire the fiefs it had lost : but this proposal met with equal neglect ; tho'
Henry was far from declining to renew, under his mediation, the conferences for peace. These went so far, that a project for a three years truce was actually agreed upon between Henry and Sigismund, when advice came that the French, notwithstanding all they had suffered by the battle of Agincourt, had recommenced hostilities against the English in the Caux; and that, having taken into their pay a number of Genoese and Flemish ships and sailors, they had not only blockaded Harfleur, but were ravaging the coasts of England.
 Those accounts broke off all negotiations for peace, and gave the emperor a very indifferent notion of the French faith. The truth is, the abilities of the constable, Armagnac, had given a new face to the affairs of France. He had purged the city and university of Paris of the Burgundian faction, and entirely broken the measures which that duke had formed against the court. The blockade of Harfleur still continued ; but the French fleet was defeated by that of England;

England, which Henry had fitted out with amazing expedition, and that too with so great loss, that the duke of Bedford easily relieved Harfleur, and the constable thought proper to raise the blockade.

Behaviour
of the French
prisoners in Eng-
land.

Before Sigismund left England, it is certain that he entered into some engagements with Henry, who hoped to make him serviceable to him in his designs upon France; but we hear of no subsidies he received, and of no acts of sovereignty that he exercised in England. Henry's project was deeper laid, for it was to make sure of the duke of Burgundy. In order to have an interview with him, he went over to Calais; where he concluded a short truce with the court of France, to last from the ninth of October to the second of February following. The duke then, with some difficulty, was persuaded to return to Calais, where he soon finished his negotiation with Henry. The terms were of the most extraordinary nature. The duke recognized Henry's title to the French crown, and promised all the assistance he could give him to make it good. He acknowledged that he owed Henry homage; but he desired to be excused from paying it at that time, or till Henry should possess himself of a considerable part of France. He likewise stipulated, in the mean while, for leave to perform some slight shew of allegiance to king Charles.

This negotiation, though carefully concealed by both parties, was suspected by the French court; and it is certain that the duke of Bourbon, one of the illustrious French prisoners at London, offered even to acknowledge Henry's right to the same crown, if he would give him liberty to return to France; which Henry granted, but found the duke was only trifling. Upon this, he ordered his fleet to be assembled; and he landed in Normandy with about twenty-six thousand fighting men, all of them well-armed and well appointed.

Successes
of Henry.

He soon reduced the strong castles of Tonque and Dambieres, and directed his march against Caen; which he besieged, and took, after meeting with a gallant resistance; but he made a most barbarous use of his success, by putting a great number of the inhabitants to death in cold blood, for no reason but their loyalty to their native prince. The success of Henry, after taking Caen, was prodigious, in the reduction of fortifications in Normandy; and, before the end of the year 1418, he besieged and took Falaise, one of the strongest places in France. He then divided his army into three bodies, intending to complete the conquest of Normandy; which, by the daily reinforcements he received, he effected, all to the city of Rouen. In the capitulations granted by Henry, the gunners who served against the English were exempted from quarter; but the truth is, great part of his success was owing to the distracted state of affairs at the court of France.

John,

John, duke of Touraine, succeeded his elder brother as dauphin of France. This young prince, who was about eighteen, had married Jaqueline, daughter and heir to the count of Hainault; and, by his persuasion, he had embraced the duke of Burgundy's party. That prince likewise dying, the third son of Charles, the count of Ponthieu, became dauphin of France. This prince, though no more than sixteen years of age, had spirit and understanding far above those of his deceased brothers. Being informed that his mother had now abandoned herself to the most criminal intrigues, and that she had no regard either for her husband or the kingdom, but as they served her interest, he attached himself to the constable Armagnac; and the loyalists looked upon him as the head of their party. The constable, notwithstanding all his obligations to the queen, could not bear with her rapaciousness and indecency. She had prevailed with her weak husband to pass an instrument, by which she was intrusted with the government; and she had amassed immense sums; which, with her jewels, which were likewise of great value, she had, for the greater security, lodged in the churches of Paris and its neighbourhood. The dauphin and the constable had intelligence of this, and seized the money for the public use, which exasperated her so much, that she retired to Vincennes; where her course of life was more profligate and abandoned than ever.

The constable informed Charles of his dishonour, and he repaired to Vincennes; where meeting with the lord of Boisbourdon, one of the queen's gallants, coming out of her apartment, he ordered him to be seized, put to the torture, with the sewn up in a sack, and thrown into the sea. As to the queen, she and her daughter, Catharine, were sent to Blois, and from thence to Tours, without being permitted to see the king.

The duke of Burgundy did not fail to improve, to his own purposes, those events, which were equally destructive and disgraceful to France. He published manifestoes, offering his services to the king and royal family, for delivering them from the thralldom they were under. He had all the success he could desire. A declared breach being now made between the queen and the dauphin, it was natural for her, unprincipled and abandoned as she was, to call in the assistance of that power which could turn the balance in her favour; and she entered into a private correspondence with the duke of Burgundy. That prince had, at this time, by continuing his fair professions, especially by promising to abolish the most grievous taxes, made a most surprising progress. Amiens, Abbeville, and several other considerable places, had declared themselves in his favour. His manifestoes had rendered the dauphin and the constable unpopular, by representing them as the jailors and tyrants of the king; and he marched for Paris.

Paris itself; of which he might have gained possession, had not the negotiation he entered into with the queen, contrary to that invincible hatred they had before entertained for each other, prevailed upon him to march to Troyes, to which city she had escaped from Tours. He found her there exercising all acts of royal dignity, in consequence of the powers she had formally obtained from the king for that purpose. She had given the sword of constable to the duke of Lorraine, and she had a chancellor in parliament of her own creating.

Such was the situation of France, when Henry V. resolved, in good earnest, to place himself on its throne. Few nations had ever been more ripe for destruction than France was at this time. It could not properly be said to have any object of allegiance, the king being no more than a name, whose authority was contended for by different parties. The duke of Burgundy's faction and that of the queen, were now the same; and he had formally recognized Henry V. of England as lawful king of France. The princes of the blood, who were prisoners in England, had promised to do the same; but Henry saw plainly that all of them acted from convenience, and through resentment; and that he could depend only on his own sword. He was still in Normandy, the greatest part of which he had reduced. He had given orders for closely imprisoning the duke of Bourbon, and the other French princes, prisoners in England, because they had failed in their engagements to him; and he was, at this time, so pressed for money, as to be obliged to pawn even his regal jewels; so that nothing less than the crown of France could indemnify him for his expences.

Rouen,

Cardinal Ursins, on the part of pope Martin V. was then mediating a peace between the two kingdoms, and between the two governing parties in France; but without effect, in regard to Henry, who never relaxed in his warlike operations; for he was then besieging Pont del Arche, which he soon took; and nothing now remained but the conquest of Rouen, to put him in possession of both the Normandies, and consequently of all France. This was a serious consideration, and favoured the cardinal's negotiation between the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy. The city had declared itself highly in his favour. It contained an hundred thousand fighting men of its own inhabitants; and its garrison consisted of four thousand of the best troops in France, and under the best generals. After Henry had invested it, he reduced the inhabitants to such extremities, that they sent a priest to Paris, to represent, before the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy, their distress.

and negotiates with all parties.
Henry dreaded a coalition between those two parties, and he entered into a negotiation with both. He was fully convinced that the duke of Burgundy had now abandoned all thoughts of his engagements with him as king of France;
and

and, without giving up any part of his conquests, or relinquishing his claim upon the estates that had been ceded by the treaty of Bretigni, he proposed to deliver the king out of the duke of Burgundy's hands, provided the dauphin would assist him in conquering Flanders. This proposition was thought so extravagant, that the dauphin's commissioners refused to produce their powers; and his negotiation with the duke of Burgundy terminated as fruitlessly.

Both parties at the court of France were now sensible that Henry was their common enemy, and they were inclinable to unite with each other against him; especially as the city of Rouen continued to make a noble defence. The king, queen, and duke of Burgundy, had advanced, to its relief, as far as Beauvais; but found it impracticable to raise the siege. Fifty thousand of the inhabitants, by this time, had perished by hunger and diseases; and Henry's rigour had made them resolve on the desperate effort of making a general sally, and dying or conquering. Henry heard of this resolution, and relaxed in his terms, but obliged them to surrender at mercy. He made an ungenerous use of his conquest, by plundering the place, and striking off the head of the brave Blanchard, who defended it. He now wore the ducal robes of Normandy, and acted, in every respect, as its sovereign. He received the keys of Caudebec, Monstrueil, Dieppe, Fescamp, Arques, Neufchâtel, Denicourt, Eux, Monchaulx, Vernon, Mantes, Gournay, Honnefleu, Ponteau de Mer, Tancarville, Vallemont, Neufville, and St. Germain sur Cailly. His farther successes.

So disastrous a train of events assisted the negotiations of the pope's legates; and it was at last agreed, that the royal power should be exercised jointly by the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy. The constable, who was well acquainted with the duke of Burgundy's engagements to Henry, opposed this accommodation, and the chancellor refused to put the seals to it; but it was carried, and peace was proclaimed between the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy.

The very night after this proclamation had been made, the gate of St. Germain was betrayed to the Burgundian faction; who immediately massacred the constable Armagnac, the archbishops of Rheims and Tours, five prelates, the abbot of St. Dennis, and forty magistrates, with many of the inferior rank, in the most barbarous manner. The dauphin, probably, would have undergone the same fate, had it not been for Tannequin du Châtel, governor of the bastle, who hurried him away in his shirt in the night time. For some days after this surprisal, the public executioner was the sovereign of Paris. The common people, indeed, declared themselves for the duke of Burgundy; but it was only that they might have a pretext first to murder, and then to plunder. Even after the queen and that duke, whose interests were again united, had made a triumphal entry into Paris, the hangman patrolled the streets in his robes, attended by the the mob, and cut off the heads of all whom they pointed out for destruction; after which they rifled their houses. He had even the insolence to shake the duke of Burgundy by the hand, and treat him as his companion. In a few days, however, the duke, having reinforced his party in Paris, ordered this executioner to be hanged; and having reduced the city to some order, he and the queen joined in inviting the dauphin back to that capital.

The negotiations continued. The dauphin turned a deaf ear to this invitation, which induced the duke of Burgundy to renew his negotiation with Henry, who was fully sensible that he had then in his hands the ballance of power in France, especially as the dauphin likewise applied to him for an interview. A medley of negotiations then succeeded; in which all parties were insincere, and each endeavoured to outwit the other. Henry was courted equally by the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy, who outbid each other in their offers for his friendship. The duke employed the queen as his agent with Henry, and she carried along with her her beautiful daughter Catharine, who, next to the crown of France, was the object of Henry's affections.

The dauphin strengthened himself with allies. The duke had, at this time, the advantage of being possessed of the king's person; and the queen had the address, upon the dauphin refusing to attend, to conclude a short truce with Henry, without comprehending the dauphin. At last, the duke of Bretagne was employed to offer Henry, on the part of France, all the demands he had hitherto made; which consisted of the cession of all the territories stipulated by the treaty of Bretigni, of all his own conquests in France, and of the princess Catharine in marriage. Henry was so infatuated as to reject those terms, unless he held all the ceded countries in absolute sovereignty: a demand which, he knew, was not in the power even of the French king to agree to. Receiving a negative from the queen, who saw that the charms of the princess had made an impression on Henry's heart, he swore, at the breaking up of the interview at Meulan, that, if his demands were not complied with, he would drive Charles from his throne, and the duke of Burgundy out of the kingdom.

The dauphin was, all this time, secretly strengthening his party. The king of Castile lent him both men and ships, and the Scots sent him seven thousand auxiliaries, who afterwards did him most excellent service. The duke of Burgundy losing all hopes of accommodation with Henry, now offered to submit himself to the dauphin; and a reconciliation accordingly took place at Pouilly: but Henry, in the mean time, took Pontoise; by which he had a ready access to the capital itself. The court retired from thence to Troyes, and Henry brought the vanguard of the English army to the gates of Paris. He must have taken that city; had not the success of the dauphin's army in Normandy, and the the wretched condition of his own army, obliged him to recall the duke of Clarence, and to form the siege of Gisors, and other places, which were still at his back. His progress, as usual, was rapid; and, at last, he took Meulan, and defeated the marshal de Reux, and Douglas, the Scotch general.

The reconciliation between the duke of Burgundy and the dauphin never had been cordial; and it appears, undeniably, that the former had still a correspondence with Henry; which the dauphin discovered, and therefore resolved to take the duke off by assassination. For this purpose, it was agreed that they should have an interview at Montereau. The duke had a mistress, madam Giac, who had been very instrumental in bringing about the accommodation between him and the dauphin, with whom she held a private correspondence; and she even persuaded the duke, who was passionately fond of her, to go to Montereau. The meeting was upon a bridge, and each distrusting the other, was attended with ten followers. The duke made his obeisance to the dauphin upon his knee; and, in that posture, Tanneguy du Chastel cut him across the face with a pole-axe, and the dauphin's other attendants sheathed their swords in his body and those of his followers, of whom one Montague alone escaped by vaulting over the barriers.

We shall not amuse the reader with the various manners in which this detestable fact, which was committed on the tenth of September, 1419, is related. It is, even to this day, uncertain whether the dauphin was present, and whether the whole was not contrived and executed by Tanneguy du Chastel, to revenge the murder of his old master the duke of Orleans. The Burgundians, whom their duke had left at the extremity of the bridge, endeavoured to force their way into the castle of Montereau, but were repulsed. The king, queen, chancellor, the constable, the marshals, the presidents, parliaments and cities of France, agreed in demanding justice upon the dauphin (who disclaimed having any hand in the assassination) and in requiring that measures might be taken for setting him aside from the succession.

The late duke of Burgundy's son and successor, Philip the Good, declared his resolution of revenging his father's death; and the numerous enemies of the dauphin signed an association against him at Arras. The dauphin, to the offers he had already made to Henry, added that of Flanders, which he offered to assist him in conquering; but Henry rejected all his advances; and prolonging the truce, he closed with the offers made him by the other party, after the dauphin had been declared incapable of succession.

A meeting between him, the king and queen of France, the duke of Burgundy, and heads of their party, was held at Troyes, where a formal treaty was concluded; by which Henry was to marry the princess Catharine, to be declared regent regent of France during the life of Charles, and to inherit that crown upon his death. This treaty was ratified by the parliament and people of Paris. Henry was afterwards stiled regent and heir to the crown of France; and he was married to the princess Catharine in the presence of the queen of France and the duke of Burgundy; who were attended by forty of the French nobility, as Henry was by forty of the English. The peace was again sworn to by all parties, and the dauphin and his adherents were again proscribed.

It must be owned that the whole of this accommodation, and of the treaty of Troyes, rested upon a rotten foundation. The salique law was set aside. The king was, properly speaking, no party in the agreement. The houses of Orleans, Anjou, Alençon, Bretagne, Burgundy, and others, had a right to the crown preferable to that of Henry; and the transaction, of itself, was null and void; because, supposing the king to have been a party, and in his sound judgment, it was not in his power to divest his son of that inheritance which he himself had received from his father. A greater consideration than all still remained; which was the invincible aversion that the nobility and people of France had for the English government. We are likewise to consider that Henry's queen, Catharine, even supposing the salique law to have had no existence, could have no right to the French crown; because she had an elder sister, who was duchess of Burgundy.

Those, and a thousand other impediments, though borne down by the force of Henry's arms, presented themselves to him; but he was so dazzled by the glorious prospect before him, that he overlooked them; and his care now was to conciliate his person and measures to the French nation. In this he was not very successful; but the treaty of Troyes was guarantied, not only by the duke of Burgundy, but by the palatinate of the Rhine, the duke of Bavaria, and the emperor Sigismund.

Conduct
of the dauphin,

The dauphin, whose person and interest was, by Henry, thought to be too inconsiderable to give him any concern, behaved with amazing coolness and intrepidity, and found refuge where Henry little imagined he could, among his faithful allies the Scots. Their king, young James, had been intercepted by Henry IV. in his voyage to France, and was still a prisoner to Henry V. who looked upon him as having no will of his own. The government of Scotland, without any regard to their king's captivity, and perhaps by his private direction, voted a new supply of seven thousand men to be sent to the dauphin's assistance. They accordingly landed at Rochelle, and it is more than probable that they saved the crown of France to the dauphin. By their assistance that prince garrisoned Melun, Montereau, Montargis, Meaux, and Compeigne. He took de St. Esprit by storm; he reduced reduced Nismes, and assembled all his force and friends at Bourges.

Henry, on the other hand, took Sens, in Burgundy; and besieging Montereau, he took the town, and barbarously hanged the garrison, because they could not persuade Guetrie, the governor, to surrender the castle; which, however, he reduced soon after upon terms. Henry then besieged Melun, which was bravely defended; and despairing to take it, he sent for the king of Scots, whom he had carried over with him to France, requesting him to give orders that all his subjects should leave that kingdom; and put him in mind, at the same time, of the generous treatment he had received during his captivity in England.

The answer of the young prince to this demand deserves to be transmitted to posterity: "That, as to the entertainment he had received, thanks and gratitude were all the retribution which his captivity suffered him to make. That his majesty's request was unreasonable, because his subjects would look upon it as the effects of compulsion. But, supposing himself to be free, his majesty must have the meanest opinion of him, if he should put any consideration in competition with the happiness of his people: and concluded with conjuring Henry not to require of him things that must dishonour his character, and belye the education and the noble examples he had received at the English court." Henry had the magnanimity to admire this noble spirited reply; and, though the young prince continued his prisoner, yet he continued to act with as much freedom as if he had been upon his own throne.

The siege of Melun proved to be a work of great difficulty. It lasted for eighteen weeks, through the intrepid defence made by the garrison; and, at last, Henry was obliged to convert it into a blockade. The dauphin endeavoured to relieve the place, but in vain; and hunger, at last, brought the besieged to the necessity of accepting the capitulation proposed by Henry; but neither the terms of the capitulation, nor the faith with which it was observed, do any honour to his memory. Brabazon, the brave governor, had encountered him hand to hand; and both, unknown to each other, having fought till they were tired, Henry demanded to know his name; in which being satisfied, "Then know," said he, "that you have fought with the king of England."

Notwithstanding this, Henry would have put the brave Brabazon to death, upon a frivolous charge of his having been accessory to the duke of Burgundy's murder, had not the heralds given it as their opinion, that, by singly engaging Henry, he became his brother in arms, and ought not to be put to death in cold blood. He, however, with many other brave men, suffered a long and severe captivity: some of them dying of diseases and famine in the common jails of Paris. The truth is, Henry was disgusted and soured at the visible distrust of his conduct, entertained by the duke of Burgundy, and the other French princes who had sworn to the peace of Troyes. He gave orders for garrisoning the chief places about the capital with English. He removed the count of St. Paul from being governor of Paris, and appointed his brother, the duke of Clarence, in his room. In short, he saw he had only his army, and the personal interest of the queen of France, to depend upon. He gave the best places under the crown of France to his English officers. He was punctual in paying his troops, and he augmented the revenues of the French queen. The prince of Orange withdrew his troops from the duke of Burgundy's army, and refused to swear to the peace of Troyes; and, when Henry made his magnificent entry into Paris, that prince rode by his side in deep mourning, as he pretended, for the death of his father.

The duke of Burgundy demands justice.

A few days after, the duke of Burgundy appeared before Charles, and demanded justice upon the murderers of his father. The dauphin was named as being of that number, and was cited to appear at the marble table; the place where the vassals of the crown had formerly paid their taxations. Upon his not appearing, the process went on; and a proclamation was issued, declaring all who had been concerned in the duke of Burgundy's death, to be attainted, and convicted of that crime, banished for ever out of the kingdom of France, and pronounced unworthy to succeed to the inheritance of any estate or dominion; and all their accomplices were condemned to suffer an ignominious death, and their estates to be confiscated to the king.

The dauphin outlawed.

We do not find that the dauphin, though he might be declared guilty of contumacy for his non-appearance, was named in this sentence, or indeed in any other way than by implication. His judges seem to have been diffident as to their own authority; and, indeed, it would be no easy matter, at this distance of time, to determine whether the parliament of Paris had a right to treat the succession to the sovereignty of the French crown in the same manner as if it had been that of a common fief. But, whatever the sentiments of the judges might have been, it is certain they durst not do otherwise than they did; and Henry thought he gained a great point in thus obtaining the sanction of the parliament of Paris to that part of the treaty of Troyes which related to the dauphin's succession. But we are here to observe, that there is no clause in that treaty which formally divests the dauphin of the succession farther than by substituting Henry in his room; and, provided that the two kings of France and England, and the duke of Burgundy, with the three estates of both kingdoms, should give their consent, that they might even enter into a treaty with the dauphin. Add to all this, that the treaty had not received the sanction of

of the pope (Martin V.) which was, in those days, thought absolutely necessary for its validity.

Henry, notwithstanding the splendor of his successes and State of station, by which he was now entitled to act as king of Henry's France, was far from being in a desirable situation. His affairs. finances were low, and his army was thinned through the severity of the service. The discontents of France were daily growing. His party in Bretagne had been ruined by the count of Penthièvre, who had made that duke a prisoner. It was in vain that, by some indulgences, he endeavoured to soften the reluctance of the French to his government; and the dauphin, who was now seventeen years of age, and assumed the same titles with Henry, those of regent and heir of France, was still at the head of a great party, and a numerous army; not to mention that Henry had yet almost one half of France to conquer before he could possess it. He assembled the states of France, ing settled his regency and government there, in the beginning of the year 1421, he assembled the states of France at Paris, and they granted him a supply; but Henry, by the treatment he and his English ministers gave to such of the French as opposed it, shewed that they were resolved to command it. It consisted of no less than an eighth part of every man's ready-money; and it was raised by the most oppressive means, that of changing light money, of Henry's own coinage, for heavy; while the loyalty of the dauphin's party supplied him plentifully with the means of answering all his occasions and paying his army; whereas the Parisians were starving by thousands, in their own streets, through cold and famine.

Henry's necessities obliging him to return to England, he and turned to gave his brother, the duke of Exeter, the charge of Paris and the French court. To his brother the duke of Clarence England. he committed the care of the army and of the French government in general. The earl of Salisbury was made governor of Rouen, and all the other French governments were filled up, to the best advantage, by English subjects. Henry, upon his arrival in England, obtained from that parliament a confirmation of the treaty of Troyes; while the glory of his actions concealed from the public there the prodigious expence and waste, both of men and money, which was too visible in the low estate of his army and finances.

During his stay in England, short as it was, his affairs in France took an unfavourable turn. The Normans and Anjouines had, in general, declared for the dauphin; and, by his seizing some important posts on the Seine, he had freighted Paris prodigiously for provisions. The English government in France disliked to see the Burgundian faction too prevalent; and Henry could not bear to be addressed with that openness of manners which the French nobility made use of towards their sovereigns. He had checked marshal de Lisle Adam, one of the chiefs of the Burgundians, for the ease and familiarity familiarity of his address; and the marshal answering him with a boldness that gave farther offence to Henry, he was arrested at Paris by the duke of Exeter's orders. As he was one of the most popular noblemen of all the Burgundian party, the Parisians rose in a body to rescue him; but they were dispersed by six score English archers, who carried him a close prisoner to the bastile. The dauphin still maintained his party in Anjou, where he was opposed by the duke of Clarence, and supported chiefly by the Scotch auxiliaries under the earl of Buchan. The duke understood that the earl's chief quarters were at Baugy, where the Scotch lay detached from the rest of the dauphin's army; and he came to a resolution of attacking them by himself, with his men at arms and archers; while the earl of Salisbury was to bring up the rest of the English army.

The Scots gain a battle for the dauphin, The duke accordingly engaged the earl with great vigour, but was received so bravely, that he was killed by the earl of Buchan's own hand. Three thousand of the English fell in this battle, among whom was the earl of Kent with the lords Grey and Rofs. The earls of Somerset, Huntingdon, and Strafford, who had been made earl of Perche in France, and some other persons of distinction, were made prisoners; but the loss of the Scotch and French did not exceed eleven hundred men.

This victory at Baugy was the more important to the confederates, as it taught them that the English were not invincible; and gave vast spirits to the dauphin's party. The earl of Buchan declined a second engagement with the earl of Salisbury; but he laid siege to Alencon, and was obliged to raise it, for want of artillery, after defeating the earl of Salisbury's army.

The war continued with various success, but generally to the disadvantage of the Burgundians, when Henry landed at Calais, on the tenth of June, and immediately advanced to the relief of Paris, where the duke of Exeter was still blocked up by the dauphin's troops, who, upon his approach, retired towards Chartres; the siege of which he formed, but was obliged to raise it in three weeks. His party had made a considerable progress in Picardy, but was defeated by the duke of Burgundy, who retook all the places they had taken, and obliged him to retire with his army behind the Loire; from whence he was dispossessed by Henry, and forced to retreat to Bourges.

who is reduced to great distress. The dauphin's affairs, at this time, were in a most unpromising situation. He was, by way of derision, called the little king of Bourges; which was the only place where he could live with security, because it was too strongly fortified for Henry to attempt to take it; but, on the sixth of October, he invested Meaux. The place was defended by a brave officer, who is called in history the bastard of Varus. It did not surrender till the second of May, when the miseries ries the garrison suffered compelled them to capitulate. The French part of them, and the inhabitants, were to have their lives saved; and nothing but the English, Welch, Irish, and Scotch, the governor, and three of the chief offices under him, were to be left to the mercy of Henry; who ordered them to be immediately executed on a gibbet; because as he alledged, they had put to death many of his English and French subjects.

Those conquests cost Henry so many of his best troops, that Henry applied to his allies, the emperor, and the king of Portugal, for auxiliaries, but to no purpose. The dauphin could not, indeed, oppose him in the field; but his partizans were so numerous all over the nation, that the duke of Burgundy, with the chief of the French nobility and gentlemen, who served in Henry's army, were obliged to repair to their several estates to make head against the Armagnacs, as the dauphin's friends were called.

The count of Foix, about this time, deserted the dauphin, and was made governor of Languedoc by Henry, who carried every thing before him in Normandy, and wherever his arms met with resistance. But while the dauphin seemed to be thus irretrievably ruined, Henry himself was providing him with the means of deliverance. Henry's queen, Catharine, had now brought him a son, afterwards the unfortunate Henry VI. and she was now landed at Harfleur, and proceeded to Paris, where she was met by Henry; and their court was so splendid, that the French, even those who were the most averse to the dauphin, took umbrage at the vast disparity between it and that of their unhappy king Charles VI. Even the queen of France, gay and dissipated as she was, secretly repented of her conduct; and the acrimony of the most violent Burgundians towards the dauphin began to subside upon reflecting that he was suffering for doing that to the duke of Burgundy which the latter had done with impunity to the duke of Orleans.

Henry, without regarding either the open or secret discontents of the French, subdued all the country between Paris and Boulogne, except Crotoy and Guise; which he was preparing to reduce, when he heard that the dauphin was again at the head of twenty thousand men; that he had made a dangerous progress in Normandy; that he had partizans in every corner of France; and that he had regained possession of all the provinces beyond the Loire, which river he had actually repassed to support his troops, which were employed in the siege of Cone. Henry and the duke of Burgundy resolved, if possible, to take advantage of that siege, by forcing the dauphin to a decisive battle; and they were assembling their troops for that purpose at Melun; when Henry was taken ill, and obliged to resign the command of his troops to his brother, the duke of Bedford, and the earl of Warwick.

Henry,

All the schemes of the duke of Burgundy, who was now vastly superior in strength to the dauphin, were defeated by the latter raising the siege of Coné and retreating across the Loire. By this time, Henry, who found his last moments approach, had been carried to Vincennes; where he expired, but with no very Christian sentiments, if his last words have not been misrepresented by historians, which we are apt to think they have. He is said, above all things, to have recommended to the duke of Bedford, who was present, a strict friendship with the duke of Burgundy; that the duke of Orleans, and the rest of the illustrious French prisoners in England, should never be set at liberty till his infant son was of age; and that no peace should be made with the dauphin, whom he called Charles de Valois, unless, by way of preliminary, Normandy was for ever annexed to the crown of England. He did not survive this speech, which consisted of various other particulars, for above two hours; and he died of a fistula, but some say of a dysentery, on the thirty-first of August, 1422, in the thirty-fourth year of his age, after reigning about nine years and an half.

and of Charles
VI.

It has been said, that, in consequence of Henry's last advice, the regency of France was offered to the duke of Burgundy, but that he declined it, upon which it was assumed by the duke of Bedford. The unfortunate Charles VI. of France did not long survive him, for he died on the twenty-first of October following, of a quartan ague, after living fifty-four years; during the last thirty of which he was, for the most part, in a state of insanity.

This prince, as we have already mentioned, was remarkable for the beauty and strength of his person; and the goodness of his heart, had he not been attacked by that deplorable distemper, might have made amends to his subjects for the defects of his education. Great part of his misfortunes were undoubtedly owing to the luxury, extravagance, and abandoned prostitution of his court; which was encouraged by his queen and favourites. The genius of his great men was seen by their behaviour before and after the battle of Agincourt; which they madly forced the constable to fight, nor do we find that even the states and parliaments of France, at this time, had any rule of conduct but what was dictated by fear, necessity, or interest. If the murder of the duke of Burgundy by the dauphin was atrocious, that of the duke of Orleans by the duke of Burgundy was equally so, with this difference, that the dauphin saw his own succession, his father's life and honour, with the power and dignity of his crown, usurped by a bad woman and a guilty over-grown subject, who could be punished only by the means which he employed.

His issue.

Charles VI. of France had, by his wife, Isabella, of Bavaria (who, though a wicked, was an artful woman) two sons, of his own name, who died young; Lewis, duke of Guienne, Guienne, who became dauphin, and died at the age of nineteen, after marrying the duke of Burgundy's daughter, Margaret; John, duke of Touraine, (who upon Lewis's death, became dauphin) was married to Jaqueline, daughter to the count of Hainault; and he likewise died without issue before he was twenty years of age; Charles his successor, and Philip, of whom the queen was pregnant when the duke of Orleans was murdered. The daughters were Joan, who died when she was but two years old; Isabel, who was first married to Richard II. of England, and then to the duke of Orleans; Joan, who was married to the duke of Bretagne; Mary, who died in a nunnery; and Catherine, wife to Henry V. of England, but afterwards to Owen Tudor, a Welsh gentleman, by whom she had the earl of Richmond, father to Henry VII. king of England. Besides those legitimate children, Charles VI. had a natural daughter by a young woman, with whose company the queen indulged him while he was under the power of his distemper.

Charles VII. surnamed the Victorious

THE death of Charles VI. gave so little concern to the French nation, that the duke of Bedford was the only person of great distinction who attended his funeral in person. His son, the dauphin, was then at Rochelle, where, but a few days before he narrowly escaped death, by a room falling in with him, and killing several people of distinction, particularly the lord James Bourbon. His conduct at this time, resembled that of his grandfather, Charles the Wise. He proceeded without ostentation, and by sure though slow degrees to re-establish his fortune. His father's death was a vast disadvantage to the English, because they thereby lost his authority. A great part, perhaps, the bulk, of the French nation thought themselves obliged to obey the father, and that when he no longer existed their obedience was due to the son. The modesty of his behaviour gained him many converts among his subjects. When he heard of his father's death, he appeared for one day in mourning, and the next, (when he took the title of king, but without any other parade than that of having the standard of France displayed before him) in scarlet. The duke of Bedford, who without the genius of his elder brother Henry, had all his courage and more practicable abilities, was perfectly sensible of the difficult province he had to manage, as regent. He endeavoured to reconcile in his interest the dukes of Burgundy, and Bretagne. He married the duke of Burgundy's younger sister, and procured Mary, the dowager of the late dauphin, Lewis, to be married ried to the count of Richmont, the duke of Bretagne's brother. He caused his young nephew, Henry, to be proclaimed king of France at Paris, and exacted an oath of allegiance to him from all the French nobility in the English interest.

Who
party.

Notwithstanding all those precautions, the dauphin's party was united much better than the English and Burgundian factions; and he was still master of the countries of Berry, Bourbon, Languedoc, Lyonnois, Forreç, Auvergne, a great part of Xaintonge, Poitou, the earldoms of Comminge and Armagnac, nigh the Pyreneans. What his ministers wanted in power and influence, they supplied with their unanimity, wisdom, zeal and loyalty. Their schemes were so well laid that Paris had almost fallen into their hands; and the duke of Bedford not daring to trust either the French or Burgundian troops, sent for reinforcements from England. Their schemes were in a great measure frustrated, by that duke taking Meulan, through a jealousy which the generals of Charles had of their Scotch auxiliaries, whose general had been made constable of France. The differences between his lieutenant, Stuart of Aubigny (the constable himself being then in Scotland) with the count of Aumale, who commanded for Charles, ran so high, that they separated, and Graville, who had surprized the place, and was governor of it, in indignation surrendered it to the English. Its reduction was followed by that of other towns and forts; but the count of Aumale cut in pieces, or took prisoners, a body of two thousand five hundred English.

Duke of Bedford
regent of France.

During those operations, the regent duke's presence in Paris was necessary; and he found the spirit of disaffection against the English there so strong, that he was obliged to make some examples of severity, and having now received reinforcements, he prepared to carry on the war against Charles upon a new plan, with more vigour than ever. The earl of Salisbury took Crevant, and Aubigny had orders from Charles to relieve or retake it. This drew on a general engagement between the two armies, each consisting of about fourteen thousand. On the French side, only five thousand (and those were Scots) were soldiers; but the earl of Salisbury had under him the flower of the English and Burgundian armies. The French, under the marshal de St. Severac, behaved in so cowardly a manner, that they withdrew from the field, and the Scots were defeated with the loss of twelve hundred men; Aubigny, who commanded them being taken prisoner. The vast number of places, Montagne especially, ceded in consequence of this defeat, which cost the English five hundred of their best men, seemed to be decisive against Charles, and yet the duke of Bedford found himself more uneasy than ever in his government. The people of Paris continued mutinous; the royalists, royalists, notwithstanding their repeated defeats were daily increasing, and the count of Richmont, who guided his brother, the duke of Bretagne, though brave was too imperious and turbulent for subordination.

Charles, before the battle of Crevant had sent to Scotland But re- for fresh reinforcements, which by the credit of the consta- mains ble, the earl of Buchan, then in Scotland, were raised for firm to him to the number of five thousand; and the duke of Bed- Charles. ford endeavoured to break or divide the French interest there, by setting on foot a treaty for ransoming James from his captivity. But this neither prevented the Scots from invading England, nor from renewing their antient league with France; by which they engaged themselves not to conclude so much as a truce with the English without the knowledge of the French. Charles, on the other hand, continued to be profuse of his honour towards the Scots. He created the earl of Buchan duke of Tourraine, he gave the county of Eureux to Aubigny, and raised several others of that nation to places of the highest dignity and trust in France; so that no fewer than fifteen thousand Scotch troops were in his service. Charles at the same time, received a reinforcement of a thousand foot, and six hundred lances from the duke of Milan, who did him considerable service, and upon their entering France took the marshal of Burgundy prisoner.

It was late in the year 1423, when the last division of Continu- the Scotch auxiliaries arrived, and the campaign of 1424, ance of began unfavourably for Charles, who lost Crotoy, Galliard the war, upon the Seine, Charite upon the Loire, and Sesanne in the Brie, while the Burgundians formed the siege of Guise, which was surrendered, but not till after their troops had alienated the affection of all the natives of Picardy by the ravages they committed. Juri was besieged and taken by the regent duke, and the constable, the duke of Tourraine, reduced Verneuil, upon which the regent duke was obliged to order the earl of Salisbury to join him with a thousand horse, and two thousand archers, that he might retake it. The constable drew up his army under the walls of Verneuil, and the regent offered him battle, well knowing that the impetuosity of the French was not to be restrained by the constable's authority. As he had foreseen, the viscount of Narbonne, broke out of the excellent lines of disposition that had been formed by the constable, and madly attacked the English, by whom they were cut in pieces, while the constable, and his son, the counts of Aumale, Ventadour, De Tonnere, with the best of Charles's French and Scotch officers, with five thousand of their troops were killed. The English in this battle lost sixteen hundred soldiers.

Verneuil surrendered next day, and the affairs of Charles, Distresses who had exhausted all the resources he had in his friends of Charles and his allies, seemed now to be desperate. His partizans, who who had formed a scheme for surprizing Paris, were disappointed by the regent duke, who repaired to that capital in person, where his court was very splendid, while that of Charles at Poitiers, where he then resided, was almost without the necessaries of life; but he still kept up the face of a council, parliament, and courts of revenue, which gave great sanction to his authority, however, destitute they were of power; but an unforeseen incident which happened at this time, was of incredible detriment to the English in France.

History of Jaqueline
of Brabant.

Jaqueline, dutchess of Brabant, widow to the dauphin John, had left her husband (who she alleged was unfit for marriage) and had entered into a treaty of marriage with the duke of Gloucester, brother to the regent duke; and without waiting for a divorce, they had consummated their marriage in England. The duke not contented with the possession of one of the finest women of that age, raised five thousand men, under pretence of completing the conquest of France, but in reality to recover from her husband her vast inheritance, consisting of the earldoms of Holland, Zealand, Hainault, and other great estates in the Low Countries. He was no sooner landed in France with his army, than the duke of Brabant called upon his ally the duke of Burgundy for assistance. This was a perplexing situation for the regent duke, who endeavoured to make up the breach, but in vain, through the obstinacy of the duke of Gloucester, who took Bouchain, and other places in Hainault.

The duke of Bedford was then preparing to carry the war against Charles over the Loire; but the duke of Gloucester's violence turned it into another channel, for it exasperated the duke of Burgundy so much, that he ordered his brother the count of St. Paul, and his other generals, to co-operate with the duke of Brabant's troops, and even with those of the auxiliaries that had been sent him by Charles, and who were commanded by his general Xaintrailles; but this could not prevent the duke of Gloucester, whose marriage with Jaqueline had been annulled by the pope, from becoming master of the greatest part of Hainault.

Charles.

This diversion saved Charles, especially as the duke of Bedford was indispensably obliged, at this time, to go over to England. The conduct of Charles continued still to be moderate; and it is amazing that a young man, who but some months before had so little command over his temper as to be guilty of a detestable assassination, could preserve so much moderation, presence of thought, and equanimity in bad, as well as good, fortune; for his reign began now to be chequered with both. He had been neglected in his education, but he preserved a native dignity and constancy of mind, which recommended him to his subjects, though poorly ridiculed by his enemies as insensibility: Though he had lost the great battles of Crevant and Verneuil, and though the duke of Bedford had ordered the dead body of the viscount of Narbonne to be broken on the wheel for being concerned in the murder of the duke of Burgundy, yet the affections of his subjects towards him grew stronger every day. It is true, they had nothing but their services to give him; but he increased their love by his affability and mild behaviour, and the great character he had acquired for his gratitude towards those who served him well.

During the absence of the duke of Bedford in England, Jaqueline his enemies were entirely employed in the Low Countries, reconciled; but they received a great check from the success of the husband. earl of Salisbury in Anjou and Maine, the capital of which, Mans, he took. On the other hand, the earl of Richmont was now at profest variance with the duke of Gloucester, and the English interest; and the duke of Burgundy had married the sister of the count of Eu, and half sister of the count of Clermont, who was devoted to the house of Valois. The same duke having got possession of Jaqueline's person, who had been abandoned by her second husband the duke of Gloucester, brought about a seeming reconciliation between her and her former husband, the duke of Brabant.

It was thought that the intrigues of Charles had chiefly contributed to the duke of Burgundy's marriage, and the duke of Gloucester, having married another wife in England, Jaqueline was so much exasperated at the neglect that had been shewn her, that by her will, she declared the duke of Burgundy heir to all her estates, in case she should die without male issue. Thus the English were left without indemnification or remedy for all the great expence of blood and treasure they had been at on Jaqueline's account. Charles improved every circumstance to his advantage, and though he had not money to raise armies, yet he found means to divide those of his enemies. He employed the count of Maine, brother to the king of Sicily, to feel the pulse of the duke of Bretagne, whom he found by no means intractable. He then sent the president, Louvet, to the court of Bretagne, but the duke was so averse to his person, that he ordered him to leave his territories. Charles then committed the charge of the negotiation to the queen of Sicily, who took with her Tanegui du Chastel, to the court of Bretagne, and they fairly laid before that duke the offers of Charles. Those were, to give to the count of Richmont the sword of constable, which remained still undisposed of, and such other advantages as should be thought reasonable. The duke of Bretagne was not against the proposal; but he thought thought himself obliged in honour to do nothing decisive without the duke of Burgundy's participation. This was a matter of great delicacy, and undertaken by the count of Richmont himself, who found the duke of Burgundy so exasperated with the English government, that he consented to the earl's paying a visit to Charles; but with the express condition of his entering into no farther terms, without his, (the duke of Burgundy's) knowledge and consent.

stable by Charles,

By this time, Charles and the duke of Bretagne had settled preliminaries. It was agreed, that the earl of Richmont should remain no longer than he pleased in the service of Charles, who was to deliver up two lords of his court as hostages for his safety; and likewise to resign to the duke Lusignan, Chinon, and some other places. Upon the arrival of the earl of Richmont with a vast splendid equipage at Charles's court, he was welcomed as its guardian angel; but he hesitated upon accepting of the constable's staff, on account of his engagements with the duke of Burgundy. Upon being pressed by Charles, who loaded him with honours and estates, he waited upon the duke in person; for the truth is, that both he and his brother, the duke of Bretagne, wanted only the duke of Burgundy's consent for their coming to a total rupture with the English. The duke of Burgundy did not appear to be of very different sentiments. He gave his consent for the earl's accepting of the constable's sword; and after some management he accepted of the mediation of the duke of Savoy, a firm friend to Charles, for bringing about a reconciliation with the house of Valois. But two preliminaries were insisted on. The duke of Bretagne demanded that the president, Louvet, should be dismissed from the service of Charles, on account of his having formerly betrayed him into the hands of the count of Penthièvre; and the duke of Burgundy demanded a like dismissal of Tannegui du Chastel, (the faithful companion of Charles through all his misfortunes) for having been the murderer of his father. Tannegui understanding the difficulty Charles was under with regard to his dismissal, nobly threw himself at his master's feet, and implored his permission to retire from his service, that he might spend the remainder of his days in praying for his prosperity. Louvet was as base and interested, as Chastel was open and generous, and practised upon the natural caution of Charles, so as to make him suspect the constable's sincerity. This distrust for some time threw a damp on the newly cemented alliance; but the great services performed by the constable in collecting the royalists from the different parts of France, and putting himself at their head, overthrew all Louvet's arts, and he at last retired to Provence, as Tannegui did to Biquere, of which his master had made him governor, with particular marks of his affection.

Upon

Upon the earl of Richmont's receiving the constable's staff Indiction at Chinon, in March 1425, the hostages and cautionary of the towns had been redelivered to Charles, who in October duke of following had an interview at Saumur with the duke of Burgundy. Bretagne. There it was agreed that Charles should withdraw his protection from the count of Penthievre, and that the duke should assist Charles in recovering his territory from the English, and perform homage for his duchy and his earldom of Montfort; but all was with a provision that the agreement was approved of by the duke of Burgundy. In the mean while, the constable entered with great vigour upon the exercise of his office. He took Poiterson at the head of twenty thousand men, and put its English garrison to the sword. He then besieged Beauvron, the head quarters of the English, and containing a garrison of eight thousand men; but there he was repulsed with the loss of about eight hundred of his men, his baggage and artillery, and he retired with his army into Anjou. This disgrace was owing to the ill-timed frugality of de Giac, who had succeeded Louvet at the court of Charles, and who refused to lend the constable money to keep his troops together; so that he was obliged to make an ill-judged attack upon the place. The constable had other enemies at Charles's court; but he supported himself by the lustre of his actions in Anjou, where he regained several places of importance to his master. During his absence there, Giac had quarrelled with Trimouille, another of his ministers, but Giac's interest was so great that Trimouille was banished.

The constable was, as we have already noted, in his disposition, haughty, impetuous, and ungovernable, and the arbitrary great failing of Charles was a partiality for his favourites; conduct some of whom were worthless men. Giac's wife was the same who had been mistress to the duke of Burgundy; constable Trimouille was her lover, and upon the return of the constable from his Anjouvine expedition he resolved to employ him in the ruin of Giac, whose safety was now become incompatible with his. He accordingly took Trimouille along with him, broke open Giac's house at Issoudun, took him prisoner, carried him to Dun le roy, and after forming a sham process against him for peculation, the unhappy Giac was thrown into a river and drowned; upon which, Trimouille married Giac's widow.

Though the violence of the constable on this occasion towards is not to be justified, yet it must be acknowledged that it Charles's admits of some alleviation from his situation. He had prevailed with his brother to break with the English, to whose fury he was now exposed, while the duke of Burgundy was so much concerned in the affairs of the Low Countries that he could give him no assistance. The constable therefore had no manner of dependence, but upon his credit with Charles, to prevent his and his family's ruin, which must have have been the consequence, if Charles's ministers were their enemies. Charles, upon the death of Giac, had named one Camus de Beaulieu, to succeed him; but he was stabbed by the constable near Poitiers; and next time the constable appeared before the king, the latter asking him whom he was now to have for his minister, he replied Trimouille, to which Charles consented, but acquainted the constable at the same time, that from the knowledge he had of Trimouille, he would have cause to repent of his nomination.

The English interest continues to decline.

He is joined by the count Dunois.

The duke of Bretagne inclines to his cause.

The dawn of Charles's good fortune began now to be overcast. The English under the earl of Warwick had besieged Pontorson, which was as it were the key of Bretagne; on that side, and though the garrison, which was entirely devoted to the constable, made a brave defence, it was at last obliged to capitulate. The earl of Warwick then invested Montargis; but the progress of Charles's partizans obliged him to divide his forces, and the constable having no more troops in a body under him than sixteen hundred; but those picked men, he gave the command of them to the count of Dunois, for the relief of Montargis. This nobleman then was no more than twenty three years of age; and was the natural son of the duke of Orleans, who had been assassinated by the duke of Burgundy. The constable with great justice boasted that he discovered in him a true military genius, and he gave an earnest of it in relieving Montargis, and beating the English, who besieged it; under the earl of Warwick, one of their best generals.

The duke of Burgundy had not yet openly declared himself against the English. The regent duke of Bedford, had through the inconstancy of Jaqueline, dutchess of Brabant, who eloped from the duke of Burgundy, obtained a considerable advantage, which he resolved to improve for his nephew's interest. He knew how much the duke of Burgundy had at heart the succession to that lady's estates, and he acted so wisely, that without giving her the assistance she implored; that duke returned to his connections with the English. This over-awed the duke of Bretagne, especially, as reinforcements of troops were daily pouring in from England; and he likewise made his peace with the regent duke, by acceding to the treaty of Troyes, and doing homage for the dutchy of Bretagne to young Henry. The regent duke was then in France at the head of twenty thousand men; but the good faith of his new allies was so doubtful, that he durst not follow Charles across the Loire. Trimouille advised that prince to cut off all the constable's appointments, now that his services were become useless by the defection of his brother, the duke of Bretagne; upon which he entered into connections with the lords of Bourbon and la Marche, and some hostilities were even begun; but Trimouille managed so well that those two princes were obliged obliged to make their submission, and the constable was left to struggle with his own fate.

The regent duke still found himself under such doubts and difficulties, that he could not improve those differences in the French court to the advantage of the English. The town of Mans had been betrayed to the French, but the castle was relieved by the famous John Talbot, the ancestor of the Shrewsbury family; and the earl of Suffolk, the governor, hanged thirty of the chief inhabitants, twenty priests, and fifteen friars, for being concerned in betraying the town.

The regent duke had now returned to Paris, where he assembled the states that were in the English interest; but he was forced through their opposition to drop all the proposals he laid before them for raising money, and he was obliged to depend on the great reinforcements he daily expected from England under the earl of Salisbury, who was reckoned to be the ablest and most fortunate of all the English generals. He arrived in May 1428, and the siege of Orleans, which had been already resolved upon, was immediately begun. It was thought from the situation and importance of that city, that its reduction would give a mortal blow to the party of Charles, who was therefore the more solicitous to provide it with the means of defence. The earl of Salisbury in his march to invest it, had reduced all the places that lay in his way; and having passed the Loire, about the twelfth of October, he found the garrison, which was mostly Scots, had taken the proper means of defence.

It would exceed the bounds prescribed to this history to relate the numerous operations of this siege, upon which the fate of Charles depended. The burghers and the garrison were devoted to enthusiasm to the house of Valois, and defeated the most obstinate attacks of the English, so that the earl of Salisbury, who little expected such a resistance, was obliged to send to the regent duke for new reinforcements. While those were on their march the count of Dunois threw himself into the city with eight hundred brave volunteers, and while the earl of Salisbury, who was now sensible that he could not take the place by assault, was contriving to turn the siege into a blockade, he was himself killed by a shot from the town. The English reinforcements had now marched up, but though they amounted to twenty-five thousand men, they were insufficient for completely investing the city, that was plentifully supplied with all kinds of provisions, while the count of Dunois by the perpetual sallies he made was every day diminishing the number of the besiegers, who persevered however, with surprizing intrepidity, but, as would appear, with no great judgment.

earl of Suffolk had succeeded the earl of Salisbury in the command of the siege, and he was well seconded by Talbot and Sir John Fastolf. Gaucourt, one of the bravest of the French officers, introduced a fresh supply of a thousand Scots into the city, and a large convey of provisions, which the vast numbers of the besieged soon consumed. The besiegers were themselves, at this time, distressed for want of provisions, and Sir John Fastolf, who was introducing a fresh supply was attacked by a superior number of the French and Scots, whom he defeated, and then entered the English camp in triumph. This battle, in which five hundred Scots and four hundred French were cut in pieces, was called the battle of the herrings, from the contents of the convoy, which was designed as the food of the soldiers, during the approaching season of Lent.

Charles
reinforced by the Scots.

This defeat discouraged the court of Charles so much, that he had thoughts of abandoning the relief of the place, and retiring to Dauphiny. He was now deserted by all his allies, except the Scots, who still served in his army, and their king, after his return to his own dominions, had always lived in good correspondence with the English. But though Charles had many motives to induce him to this inglorious retreat, he was diverted from it by his queen, Mary of Anjou, and his faithful mistress, the famous Agnes de Sorrel, who persuaded him to cover Berry, and Touraine, if Orleans was taken, and to fight for his remaining territories, inch by inch. Charles took this advice, but wisely resolved to revive his interest among the Scots, by proposing a match between his son the dauphin, and the eldest daughter of James, which was accordingly concluded; but all the fortune the lady had, consisted of six thousand auxiliary Scots, sent to Charles by James, after the truce between Scotland and England was expired.

There is at this time, a darkness in history of the siege of Orleans, that neither authors nor public records have cleared up. The duke of Burgundy appeared more devoted than ever to the English cause when the siege of Orleans was undertaken; but he revolted all of a sudden, and withdrew his troops from the English army. The most probable reason that can be given for this fact is, that when the siege of Orleans was formed, he expected that that city, and all the large estate belonging to the duke of Orleans would be sequestered into his hands, while that duke remained a captive in England; but when he made that demand, the regent duke's answer was that, "the English were not to beat the bushes while others were to catch the birds." Add to this, that the dissensions in the English council disabled the duke of Bedford from fulfilling his pecuniary engagements with the duke of Burgundy; and he was obliged to write over to England for a new reinforcement, and to desire that the young king should be sent over to France.

Notwith=

Notwithstanding the secession of the Burgundians from History of the siege, historians say, that Orleans must, in all appearance, the maid have fallen into the hands of the English, had not the of Orleans, famous maid of Orleans appeared; but through what agency, whether divine or human, has been doubted by the French historians, though we are in no difficulty of saying, that the whole of her appearance and conduct was the contrivance of Charles and his courtiers, assisted by her amazing courage, sagacity, and strength of body. She was the daughter of a French peasant in the village of Dompne, on the frontiers of Lorraine, and being robust and active in her person, she had, when about seventeen years of age, hired herself out to the stablekeepers, in quality of ostler or post-boy, by wearing a male-dress, and thereby she became acquainted with the roads in that part of the kingdom.

We are in the dark with regard to the persons who instructed her in the part she was to act. It is certain, that she presented herself before Badricourt, the governor of Vauculours for Charles, and that she pretended to have a divine commission for raising the siege of Orleans. It is probable, that Bradricourt was himself her instructor; but he pretended ignorance and surprize. After several trials of her virtue, resolution, and fortitude, he gave her a suit of armour, equipped her in men's cloaths, a horse and furniture, and sent her under an escort of twenty knights to Chinon, where Charles then resided.

Though the journey between Vauculours and Chinon, was thought to be impracticable, because the English were in possession of the roads, yet Joan knew the country so well, that she eluded all their vigilance, and arrived at Charles's court. As she had for two months resided with Badricourt, we need not wonder that she easily distinguished Charles in the midst of his courtiers. She accosted him, and acquainted him with her divine mission. He affected doubt, astonishment and diffidence.. He referred her to his ministers and divines, who examined her, and gave testimony in her favour. She pretended to reveal to Charles (which she might easily do) a fact that was known to none but himself; and he then appeared to be convinced of her miraculous authority. She chose a particular sword that lay in the church of St. Catharine, who, as she said, had communicated to her her mission; and she made so good an appearance in her new character, that Charles resolved she should head a convoy of provisions destined for the garrison of Orleans, which if not supplied, must soon surrender thro' famine.

She chose her own standard, and went to Blois, where who raises the troops she was to head rendezvoused. She wrote an the siege enthusiastic letter to the English king, regent and generals, of Orleans, commanding them to break up the siege of Orleans, and to evacuate France. Before she began her march, she cleared the

the camp of lewd women, and all her dispositions were so masterly, that Charles, by the advice of Gaucour, governor of Orleans, who was then at court, and his other generals, ordered twelve thousand men to attend her. They were not deceived in the opinion they had of her abilities. Her measures were so just, and her conduct so resolute, that the English abandoned one of the towers they had built above Orleans, and she taking possession of it, carried the convoy safe into that city; but was favoured by a sally, which the count of Dunois, who commanded the garrison in Gaucour's absence, made on the opposite side of the town. This success was not so extraordinary as the grandeur and intrepidity of her deportment. She held her standard in one hand, and wielded her sword with the other; she harangued the soldiers in a strain of enthusiasm that made them all heroes; and she was received into Orleans as a divinity. Next day, she and the count of Dunois made a vigorous sally, by which another convoy entered the city, and the English themselves were as much dispirited as the French were elevated, with the thoughts of her being indued with supernatural power. Even the brave lord Talbot was affected with this belief, and remained inactive, while Joan de Arc, (for so she was called) in person, stormed the chief tower of the English, and put all that were in it to the sword. This success emboldened Charles's generals to take measures for driving the English entirely from before Orleans; and the growing reputation of Joan brought thousands to her standard.

Without descending to farther particulars, after harassing the enemy, and storming their forts, she attacked and carried the Tourelle, the strongest post the English had, and garrisoned by all their army. This operation was the more glorious for Joan, as it was undertaken against the advice of all the French generals, even the count of Dunois himself. Though wounded in the attack, she discovered no symptoms of faintness or concern; but after razing the Tourelle, and all its works, to the ground, she returned to Orleans; and next day, the English generals, who were thoroughly persuaded of her supernatural powers, raised the siege of Orleans, to the equal joy and amazement of the French.

Nothing can give us a higher opinion of Joan, than a letter, still extant, from the duke of Bedford to his nephew king Henry; by which it appears that he actually believed her to be an enchantress, and assisted by the devil. She now became a great general as well as heroine. She very judiciously stopt the pursuit of the English, to which the other French generals were inclined; and after her wounds had been dressed, she provided every thing for the future defence of Orleans, and marching to Charles at Chinon, she told him she was come to conduct him to Rheims for his coronation.

coronation. Her word was received as a law; and though her person was almost adored by the king and his court, she refused acting in any other capacity than that of a volunteer under the duke of Alençon, who had lately been discharged from his captivity in England, and was sent to besiege Jargean, where the earl of Suffolk had shut himself up. This place held out but ten days. Joan was the first who marched up to the breach, and tho' wounded with a stone, she entered it sword in hand. Five hundred of the English were killed on this occasion, and the earl of Suffolk was taken prisoner by one Renaud. Before he surrendered himself, he asked his captor whether he was a gentleman, and being answered in the affirmative, "Are you a knight, (rejoined the earl;) the other answering that he was not, "Then kneel down (said the earl) that I may dub you one, for I can surrender to none of less quality;" which was accordingly done.

The constable of France had all this while absented himself from his master's court; but on this happy turn of his affairs he attended him with a gallant train of noblemen, and twelve hundred soldiers; and promised Joan, who was his duty. for having him arrested as a traitor, that he would merit his pardon by his future conduct. The French then took Meun and Baugenci, in sight of the English army under the lords Scales, Talbot, and Sir John Fastolf, the soldiers declaring that they thought it madness to fight against the devil. They retired to Jenville, and though reinforced with six thousand men sent them by the duke of Bedford, they were defeated almost without resistance at Patay, where the lords Talbot, and Scales, were taken prisoners; two thousand English were killed, and Sir John Fastolf, who had all along behaved so gallantly, was seized to such a degree, with the epidemical panic of his countrymen, that he fled out of the field in the beginning of the action. The consequence of the English defeat at Patay was, that the French took the strong fortress of Jenville, where the English had all their magazines.

The affairs of Charles were now in so prosperous a condition, that he took the field in person, and was preparing for other warlike operations; but was persuaded by the Charles maid to set out for his coronation at Rheims. This, to all appearance, was a desperate resolution, as the country through which he was to march was in the hands of the English; but though the troops of Charles were ready to mutiny, she soon quelled them by taking Troyes, and securing their march to Rheims, during which the town of Chalons surrendered to Charles. His coronation was as splendid as his situation could admit of; but it was with difficulty he prevailed upon Joan (who said that her commission was at an end) to continue in his service. Though the courtiers and counsellors of Charles had opposed the advice advice she gave to the king of marching to Rheims, it soon appeared to be dictated by sound policy; and indeed our astonishment at her success can be only abated by the strong affection which the French in general now had for their native sovereign. Their loyalty, if possible, was augmented by his coronation, and he no sooner summoned a place to surrender than it opened its gates.

Conduct
of the duke of Bedford,

The duke of Bedford was then at Paris, where he had entered into new engagements with the duke of Burgundy, and received a strong reinforcement of troops from England. After leaving a sufficient garrison in that capital, he took the field with twelve thousand men; but durst not remove too far from the neighbourhood of Paris. He chose a strong camp between Melun and Montereau, and the army of Charles, which was vastly superior to his in numbers, having faced him for some days, but without attacking him, the regent considered it as a kind of victory, and after challenging Charles to a battle, he drew off towards Paris, while the other proceeded to secure the conquests the English had made upon the Loire. Charles was successful in this beyond his expectation, and he besieged Senlis, which was defended by an English and Burgundian garrison, but it was driven out by the inhabitants, who surrendered the place to Charles.

constable.

In the mean while, the constable, to make good his promise to Joan, had marched towards Eureux, and took castle Galliard, and delivered the brave Brabazon, who, ever since he had been taken at Melun, had, to the disgrace of the English, remained shut up in an iron cage. The constable, after this, reduced Aumale, and made such a progress in Normandy, that the duke of Bedford having committed the charge of Paris to Ratclif, one of his general officers, marched against him. Charles then advanced towards Paris, and took possession of St. Dennis, still accompanied by his faithful Joan, who was wounded in storming one of the bulwarks of Paris; but Charles was obliged to desist from the attack, and to retire towards the Loire. The duke of Bedford hurried back to Paris, and retook St. Dennis; but it was visible that he was not seconded by the duke of Burgundy with the same spirit as formerly; for which many reasons are assigned that are foreign to this part of our history; and he even agreed to make a truce with Charles for Picardy and the countries upon the Seine; after which he marched to Paris with four thousand men. The regent duke was embarrassed by his visit, and his party offered him the regency; which he, no doubt, would have accepted of, had he not been apprehensive that the regent duke would have made a separate peace with Charles.

The duke
of Bur- gundy
regent.

The duke of Bedford knew of this offer, and he persuaded the duke of Burgundy to accept of it till the following Easter; but, at the same time, he brought the other to renew his engagements engagements with England. In the year 1430, the duke of Bedford, who had, by this time, resumed the regency, and recovered some places from the French, resigned all that the English had in Poitou to the duke of Bretagne, to obtain his friendship. At the same time, he gained over the duke of Savoy and the prince of Orange; and a confederacy was formed for dispossessing Charles of Dauphiny; but it was defeated by the vigilance and activity of Gaucour, and the prince's dominions were seized by Charles.

No man but so accomplished a general and statesman as the duke of Bedford was, could have maintained the footing of the English in France, at this time, against the discontent of the Burgundy interest and the universal disposition of the French towards their king. He had resigned Champagne and Brie to the duke of Burgundy, who was to have a pension of twelve thousand marks besides. He kept up the spirit of his party, by assuring them that young king Henry was coming to be crowned at Paris, and was to bring with him a strong army. Henry accordingly landed at Calais, and went to Rouen; while the duke of Bedford discovered, and punished, a conspiracy that had been formed for delivering up Paris to Charles; who, however, made himself master of Sens and Melun.

The siege of Compeigne was then formed by the duke of Burgundy, and defended by the gallant Joan d'Arc, who continued to signalize herself by her courage and conduct; but following the advantages she had gained in a sally too far, she was taken prisoner by a Burgundian gentleman, one Lionel de Vendosme. Her captivity is said to have been owing to the meanness of the French officers, who were jealous of the glory and reputation she had acquired.

Luxembourg, the constable of Burgundy, claimed Joan for his prisoner, and shut her up in a tower. The death of the duke of Brabant, which now happened, obliged the duke of Burgundy to leave the siege of Compeigne, and to carry off with him part of his army; so that the count of Vendosme, Charles's general, found means to raise the siege with considerable loss to the Burgundians and English.

On the seventeenth of December, young king Henry was crowned at Paris; but his French friends were disgusted when the cardinal of England, instead of the archbishop of Paris, placed the crown on his head. The duke of Burgundy had now returned to Paris, and found the French, in general, more discontented than ever with the English. The bishops of Beauvais and Narbonne were the only two French peers who had assisted at the coronation; and, notwithstanding the regent duke's prudence, the insulting manners of the English, who attended Henry, towards his French subjects, rendered it difficult for him to preserve appearances between them.

Luxembourg, who was now created count de Ligni, sold Joan to the duke of Bedford for nine hundred pounds and an annuity of twenty-five pounds. She had been in daily expectation of being ransomed; but she no sooner heard of this bargain, than she gave herself over for lost, and attempted to make her escape by jumping from the top of the tower where she was confined; but she was retaken, and carried to Rouen, where she was put in irons. The university of Paris, at the regent duke's instigation, formally accused her of witchcraft; and she was brought to her trial before the bishop of Beauvais, who was her enemy, even to enthusiasm. Her process lasted for four months and an half; but her adversaries, with all their ingenious malice, could not fix the smallest reproach upon her life or morals. She answered the ensnaring questions put to her with great justice and address, and must have been acquitted, had not the English government thought it necessary she should be condemned, in order to destroy, in the minds of the people, the opinion they had of her divinity. The bishop, hot as he was, could not condemn her without being indemnified by the English if his conduct was questioned by the pope or the consistory at Rome.

The maid tried, condemned, and burnt, This being settled, she was pressed to change her male for a female dress; which she refused to do, because enjoined otherwise by St. Catharine. She was asked by the bishop, Whether she would submit to the judgment which the church had pronounced in her case. She agreed; and, because she refused to recant the divine revelations which she pretended to have received, she was condemned. Her sentence was mitigated from death to perpetual imprisonment, and her subsisting upon bread and water. This sentence was too mild in the eyes of the English; she behaved with a becoming resignation to the sentence of the church; and had even quitted her male attire, which was one condition of her sentence being mitigated; but she was afterwards frantic enough to dress herself in a suit of man's cloaths which the English had left in her room purposely to tempt her. This fresh offence being proved, the court met again, and declared, that, as she had been convicted of blasphemy, idolatry, sorcery, witchcraft, heresy, wearing man's apparel, and carrying arms, she was a relapsed heretic, and adjudged to the flames; which she was obliged to submit to in the old market-place at Rouen, after a most devout preparation for death. Charles, afterwards, upon solemn enquiry, repealed her condemnation, and, in gratitude to her memory, ennobled her parents and family.

An attempt on Rouen defeated. Henry having held a bed of justice, returned to Rouen, where he was thought to be more safe than at Paris; but the castle of Rouen itself was surprized by a French gentleman, one Ricarville, with six score soldiers, who were to have have been supported next day by marshal Boufjac; whose men, before they reached the place, quarrelled about the plunder and deserted him. The castle, upon this, was invested and taken by the English, who struck off the heads of fifty of the French soldiers.

Chartres was, at this time, in the hands of the Burgundians, and was surprized by the count of Dunois, who had, for that purpose, bribed two of the inhabitants who were prisoners. To compensate for this loss, the English, in like manner, surprized Montargis; and the earl of Arundel cut in pieces a body of the French under Xaintrailles, who was taken prisoner on the borders of Normandy. He was offered to be exchanged for the lord Talbot, but the bargain was not concluded. The English, however, upon the whole, at this time, suffered more than the French. They were defeated by Ambrose de Lore before St. Celerine; and the duke of Bedford was, by the count of Dunois, who threatened to attack Paris, obliged to raise the siege of Lagni with considerable loss. De Lore surprized the merchants at the Michaelmas fair which was held near Caen, plundered their effects, and carried off eight hundred of the most wealthy among them, prisoners, for the sake of their ransom.

The duke of Bedford was forced to behold all these calamities without being able either to prevent or remedy them. All that he could do was to preserve Normandy and Paris for his nephew, and to prevent a truce from taking place, which was negotiating between Charles and the duke of Burgundy, by the pope's legate. The death of his dutchess, who was sister to the duke of Burgundy, and his marrying soon after a young lady, daughter to the count of St. Paul, cooled the personal friendship which had hitherto subsisted between those two dukes.

The French had endeavoured to retake Montargis, but were Trimouille prevented by the negligence, as was alleged, of Trimouille, seized and who continued to be first minister to Charles. That prince imprisoned was so cautious and reserved, that it was difficult to know ed by the his sentiments; but there is some reason for thinking that constable. he was beginning to be apprehensive of Trimouille's too great power, when the constable and the count of Maine entering his palace at Chinon with a small party, seized the minister's person in a room next to that of the king, and carried him off prisoner. Charles affected to be violently enraged at this insult upon his authority; but the queen, who was in the conspiracy, soon appeased him, and he not only accepted off Charles of Anjou, count of Maine, brother to the queen, as his first minister, but approved, in an assembly at Tours, of all that had been done with regard to Trimouille. This revolution in the council of Charles, was of infinite service to his affairs. It gave a consistency to his councils, united the princes of his blood, and once more brought over the duke of Bretagne to his interest, his brother the constable's chief enemy being now removed from court, and himself re-admitted into the king's favour.

All the English part of France, about the beginning of the year 1433, was afflicted by a famine, and lord Talbot being now exchanged for Xaintrailles, resumed his command in the English army, but it had been seized with a pestilence, which carried off the count of St. Paul, one of their ablest generals. His death was irreparable to the English, who were daily losing footing in Picardy, where the French took the important town of Pont de Remi on the Soane, and made a terrible irruption into Burgundy, while de la Hire took the town of Somme, and laid the Cambresis under contribution.

Conduct
of the captive duke of Orle- ans.

The duke of Orleans remained still a prisoner in England, where he was of infinite service to Charles. He gave in a paper of proposals for a general congress, where a negotiation for peace between the two crowns was to be opened, and the cardinal of Winchester's faction, which was very powerful in England, seconded his overtures. The duke of Bedford, though he foresaw that they had been made with the insidious purpose of diverting the attention of the English from the prosecution of the war, was obliged to give way to the motion; but the councils of England being now divided, he remained so unsupported in France, that he was unable to prevent a general rebellion from breaking out in the Upper Normandy, which threatened the loss of that province to his nephew. Charles, however, was unable at this time, to support the insurgents, and they were quelled by the earl of Arundel, and lord Willoughby, with the loss of a thousand of their number, the rest being suffered, upon promise of amendment, to depart quietly home. Other rebellions broke out at the same time, and were with equal difficulty suppressed; but the marshal de Rieux, one of Charles's generals, secured Dieppe and Harfleur, while de Bressay, another of his officers, surprized Rue. This place was of so much importance, that the duke of Bedford sent orders to the earl of Arundel, who was esteemed the most fortunate of all the English generals in France, to hazard every thing for its recovery. The earl on his march attacked Gerberoy, a place of but little strength, but defended by de la Hire, one of the most active of the French generals who defeated and killed the earl. His loss was supplied by the brave lord Talbot; but the duke of Bedford was obliged all this year to reside in England, where parties ran very high. Talbot threw himself into Paris, and took Joigni, which he razed to the ground, after hanging up the French garrison. After this, he reduced Beaumont, and a great number of other places, but proceeded against the natives with a severity that was equally unwarrantable and impolitic.

Success of lord Tal- bot in France.

The

The duke of Bourbon, about this time died a prisoner in England, but was succeeded by his son, the count of Clermont, who had performed many great services to Charles, whose interest now gained such footing in France, that the duke of Bedford, in the beginning of the year 1434, went over to Paris. He found that the lord Talbot had been successful beyond expectation; but that the affairs of the English in all other respects were next to desperate. The duke of Burgundy had secretly resolved to make his peace with Charles. He complained that the duke of Bedford had treated him disrespectfully in the affair of his marriage; that his attachment to the English endangered his losing the Low Countries, and that the divisions in the English council afforded him no prospect of relief or support. He entered into a correspondence with the constable; and a meeting being proposed between him and the regent duke at St. Omer, both of them repaired thither, but left it on a ridiculous dispute about the ceremonial, without seeing one another.

Conferences were all this while going on at Calais, in consequence of the duke of Orleans's proposal, by which the French and Burgundian parties had an opportunity of knowing one another's sentiments. It was not long before the preliminaries between Charles and the duke of Burgundy were settled, by the agency of the constable, and the duke of Bourbon; and an armistice was agreed upon. The sister dutchesses of Burgundy and Bourbon were highly instrumental in this reconciliation, and the conferences for peace were transferred from Calais to Arras, under the auspices of the general council, then sitting at Basil. Those negotiations were carried on with great pomp, but no efficacy. The duke of Burgundy had not yet avowedly broken with the English; and he was nominated to be their first commissioner at the treaty.

The terms of the French commissioners were "That the English should be left in possession of as much of Guienne, as they already held, with the dutchy of Normandy; but upon condition of their holding them as fiefs of the crown of France, and Henry renouncing all pretensions to the said crown." The French were secretly encouraged by the duke of Orleans, (whom the English thought to be in their interest) not to depart from those terms. The English on the other hand demanded, "That Charles should be left in peaceable possession of all he already had on both sides of the Loire, on condition that the English should retain the like possession of all they held in France; but that, to prevent any future differences, the places of the one power, which lay in the heart of the other's possession, should be exchanged for the like places to be given up by the other power, or for some other equivalent. They likewise offered, that their king should marry a daughter of Charles; and that that the duke of Orleans should be set at liberty for a moderate ransom."

His terms. Those two papers were so incompatible, that an end was put to the conferences, and the duke of Burgundy immediately concluded a definitive treaty with Charles. The terms were, that the latter should give the duke all the satisfaction that was in his power, with regard to his father's murder; that he should pay him fifty thousand crowns for the jewels which were taken from his father at the time of his death; and that the following estates should be delivered up to him and his heirs, whether male or female; Mascon, in Xaintoigne; the city of Auxerres, with the jurisdiction of Barry on the Seine; the city of Castel, with the lay patronage of the church and abbey of Leuzeule; pretended to, but never possessed, by the dukes of Burgundy before; the cities of Montidier, Perrone, St. Quintin, Corby, Amiens, and Abbeville; the county of Pontian and Poictou, with the out-bounds of Champaign. Charles was to assist the duke of Burgundy, if attacked by the king of England; and to be bound to make no peace with England in which the duke was not included. If he failed in his agreement with the duke, his subjects were to be discharged from all their allegiance to him, and to assist the duke against him; that the count of Carolois, the duke's son, should marry the king's daughter, with an hundred and twenty thousand crowns for her portion.

Death of the queen dowager of France. While this negotiation was on foot, two great personages died; the one was the regent duke of Bedford; and the other, Isabella, queen-dowager of France, who ended her life in contempt and poverty; being, according to the French historians, upbraided to her face with infidelity to her husband's bed. Her death was of vast service to Charles, because her party, who were very numerous, joined him. The count of Dunois had surprized St. Dennis, which the English were resolved, at all events, to retake. They accordingly besieged it, and thereby suffered Meulan to fall into the hands of the French. The count of Dunois made some attempts to relieve it; but being unable to force the English entrenchments, it was surrendered, after being laid in a heap of ruins by the siege.

The lord Willoughby was then the English governor of Pontoise, but the Parisians had begged him of the English government to command in their city. Leaving Pontoise, he had left Sir John Ripley, a weak, rash man, to command in his absence. The marshal de L'Isle Adam was then in the pay of Charles, and joined with the count of Dunois in a scheme for retaking Pontoise; which they effected through the imprudence of the governor, and a correspondence they had in the place. The duke of Burgundy endeavoured to apologize, at the court of London, for the separate treaty he had made; but the excuse was so ill received, that Charles immediately entertained hopes of his actually declaring against the

the English; especially as the duke of Gloucester was his avowed enemy.

In the beginning of the year 1436, the duke of Burgundy Farther began to act hostilely against the English, by putting Vincennes successes and Corbeil into the hands of Charles; which encouraged a of Charles, number of other places in Normandy to revolt from the English, and Charles now prepared to execute his capital purpose; that of recovering Paris. He was thoroughly reconciled with the duke of Burgundy; and, to carry his favourite scheme into execution, he amused Henry's ministers with the project of a marriage between their master and his eldest daughter. In the mean while, the constable of France, by order of Charles, made a general muster of his army at a place, near Paris; and, though they did not amount to above eight or ten thousand men, it was resolved to attempt to take it. The lord Willoughby's garrison did not consist of above fifteen hundred. The citizens began now to be straitened for provisions, the navigation of the Seine being in the hands of the French; and the Burgundians had, in imitation of their master, left the English interest. The bishop of Beauvais, and the other prelates, who still adhered to England, made them take repeated oaths of fidelity to Henry; but all was to no purpose, for now the Burgundians wanted only a pardon for their past transgressions, which the constable produced ready signed and sealed by Charles and the duke of Burgundy; upon which it was resolved to lose no time in admitting his troops into the city. The marshal de L'Isle who re- Adam was the first who scaled the wall in the night-time; gains Pa- and, by breaking open a postern-gate, gave admission to the ris. constable and the count of Dunois with their troops.

The lord Willoughby did not know of this revolution till the morning; when, seeing that the inhabitants were unanimously for Charles, and had thrown away the English badges, he retired with his soldiers into the bastile. The constable offered them terms, and that they should have liberty to retire to Rouen with their arms and baggage; which being accepted of, Paris once more came under the dominion of its lawful master. It is but doing justice to the constable, to acknowledge, that, in the whole of this important transaction, he behaved with great address and good faith. He even hazarded his life in protecting the Burgundian party from being plundered by his soldiers; and, by his care, the rate of provisions were, in twenty-four hours time, reduced to one half of the price they had sold for before his admission into the city.

The duke of Burgundy had now thrown off all restraint The siege towards the English, and had actually besieged Calais with of Calais fifty thousand men; but he was, by the duke of Gloucester, by the with no more than fifteen thousand men, obliged to raise the duke of siege with loss, his troops being raw and undisciplined. The Burgun- duke of York, who succeeded the duke of Bedford, as the dy. English

English regent of France, was then covering Normandy and the county of Caux; but this did not prevent the French from making a vast progress, both in Normandy and Picardy; the particulars of which are so various, that they cannot be described here, especially as they consist of little more than the names of the places they reduced.

Talbot recovers Harfleur. Charles did not repair to Paris immediately after its reduction, but remained on the other side of the Loire, waiting for the princess of Scotland, who had been betrothed to his eldest son. She accordingly arrived, with a splendid train of attendants, at Rochelle, in the beginning of June, and the ceremony was performed, on the fourteenth, at Tours.

A rebellion which broke out against the duke of Burgundy in the Low Countries was of infinite service to the English interest at France in this time, and the duke of York made a considerable progress in Normandy. The lord Talbot took Harfleur, notwithstanding all the efforts of the count of Dunois to relieve it. He afterwards took Tancarville, and several other places, raised the siege of Crotoy, and surprized Pontoise itself. In November, Charles made a most magnificent entry into his capital, where he immediately re-established his parliament and courts of justice; but he was soon driven out of it by a plague, and famine, which rendered that city a desert, and filled the provinces of France with rapine and violence.

Personal valour of Charles. All the cares of Charles, therefore, to establish the police and manufacture of his kingdom, were at present ineffectual. Being sensible of the disadvantages his character lay under from his inactivity and amorous complexion, he had formed the siege of Montereau, and took it, after giving the most incontestible proofs of his personal valour, by being the first who mounted the breach and entered the place. This raised his reputation among his subjects, and an incident which happened soon after gave him an opportunity of shining in his political capacity. The council of Basil was then sitting, and having quarrelled with pope Eugene IV. who had ordered it to be dissolved, they had sent their decrees to Charles, to be by him revised and confirmed. Though their conduct had not been very regular or prudent, yet their decrees contained so excellent a system of ecclesiastical discipline and subordination, that Charles called an assembly of his states at Bourges to examine them. They met with the approbation of the members, and they were formed into that famous law afterwards so well known by the name of the Pragmatic Sanction, and was the foundation of the liberties of the Gallican church. It established the elections made by the clergy with the approbation of the king; it abolished annates, reservations, and reversiones, loads with which the popes had burdened the French clergy, and freed them from many other papal oppressions. Charles, however, had not the courage to strike at at the root of the pontifical usurpations (though he curtailed many of them) for he still allowed the pope a pre-eminence in the Christian church, by admitting a final appeal to be made to him in ecclesiastical causes; and this oversight, in a great measure afterwards defeated the intention of the Pragmatic Sanction. Charles, notwithstanding the deference he paid to the council; refused to withdraw his obedience from the pontiff, whom they had excommunicated.

The duke of Orleans, though still a prisoner in England, Fresh ~~as~~ had acquired a vast influence in France, by his wisdom and negotiations experience in business; and Charles had many reasons to for peace. wish to have him about his person. His son, the dauphin, had for some time shewn evident marks of discontent, and had associated himself with such of his father's nobility as thought themselves not sufficiently rewarded; among whom were the dukes of Bourbon, and Alençon, with the counts of Dunois, and Vendosme. Charles was not ignorant of their intrigues, and applied himself to the cardinal bishop of England, whose riches gave him a vast sway at Henry's council board, with so much address that a resolution was taken to set the duke of Orleans at liberty; but the execution of it was postponed because the duke of Gloucester, opposed it.

The war was all this while going on briskly against the English, whose generals, particularly lord Talbot, performed wonders, and they defeated a double design that was attempted by the duke of Burgundy, of laying Calais, under water, and of taking Guifnes. The dutchess of Burgundy, who was descended from the duke of Lancaster, was then negotiating a peace, and had prevailed with Henry to nominate commissioners for treating both with the duke of Burgundy and the court of France. The cardinal archbishop of Rheims, with the counts of Vendosme and Dunois, conducted the negotiation on the part of Charles, as did the cardinal bishop for Henry; and the duke of Orleans, by depositing a sum of money, by way of surety, had liberty to assist at the conferences, which were held at Calais; as did the dutchess of Burgundy, and the duke of Bretagne. The terms proposed by the two parties were so incompatible, that the negotiation came to nothing.

During its continuence the constable of France had taken But the Meaux, after a noble resistance made by the English gar-war con- rison; but being defeated before Auranches, which he like- tinues, wise attempted, his army separated, nor could he re-assemble it for that season; so that the English generals obtained many advantages. This disobedience of the army occasioned Charles to reflect seriously upon the military constitution of his kingdom, and he found that, in fact, his troops were subject to no discipline, nor under any command but that of their immediate lords who brought them into the field. He observed, at the same time, that they were attended with a vast a vast number of licentious women and useless mouths; which encreased the distresses of his subjects, so that there was an evident necessity of reformation. He called together his constable, and such of his ministers as he could depend on, and laid before them a plan of introducing into his army a regular military discipline, and at the same time for the punctual payment of the soldiers.

A confederacy against
Charles

The discontented lords whom we have already named, considered this reformation as a blow aimed against themselves, because it took from them the power of distressing their fellow subjects. They had a formal meeting at Blois, where Trimouille, who had now regained his liberty, likewise made his appearance, and it was resolved they should assemble themselves in arms, which they were not to lay down till Charles should dismiss from his service the constable, and others of his ministers. Charles was fully apprized, by the count de la Marche, the dauphin's governor, of their plan, and it is said, that the constable himself appeared at their meeting; but they were so infatuated that they suffered him to escape to Charles, who cried out, when he saw him, "now I have my constable, I fear no man."

defeated.

After some conversation, Charles seemed inclined to shut himself up in a fortress, but the constable put him in mind of the fate of Richard II. and persuaded him to depend upon the affections of his subjects. Charles, then acted with a noble spirit. As the dauphin, who was then no more than eighteen years of age, had put himself at the head of the malecontents, he sent a herald to the duke of Alençon, requiring him to send him the dauphin; but in the mean while he assembled a brave army at Poitiers, and marched briskly towards the confederates. The count of Charolois, the duke of Burgundy's eldest son, had lately married the daughter of Charles, though both parties were under age, and the dauphin depended upon that duke's assistance, but he was deceived, and indeed the whole scheme of the confederacy seems to have proceeded from hot, distempered brains. Upon the king's approach, they could not assemble the face of an army. The dauphin was obliged to take refuge in the duke of Bourbon's estates. The count of Dunois threw himself at the feet of Charles, who pardoned him; and all the comfort the dauphin received from the duke of Burgundy, was, that he would intercede with the king his father for his pardon, if he and his friends would humble themselves so as to deserve it. A summons attended the dauphin and the duke of Bourbon to repair to the king, which they resolved to obey. They set out, attended by Tremouille, and two other lords, who being obnoxious to Charles, received orders on the road not to come to court. It was with difficulty that the duke of Bourbon prevailed with the dauphin to continue his journey without his lords.

Upon

Upon their arrival at court, which was then held at Conset, the king received the duke coldly, but civilly, and when he kissed his hand he gave him a gentle admonition not to offend him again. He ordered the dauphin to retire to his apartment; but next day that young prince appeared before his father, and threatened to leave the court if his three lords, to whom he said he had passed his word, were not admitted to it. Charles coldly answered, that he might be gone as soon as he pleased, and that, if the gate was too strait to suffer him to pass, he would widen it. The king's steadiness disappointed the dauphin, who thought proper to submit; but Charles removed from him all his domestics, excepting his confessor and cook, and obliged the duke of Bourbon to resign some of his strong places into his hands.

Charles was all this while incessantly labouring for the deliverance of the duke of Orleans, the only great subject he had, who, by his influence, was capable of counterballancing the malecontents; and he at last obtained his liberty, upon giving security for the payment of twenty thousand marks, great part of which is said to have been defrayed by the duke of Burgundy; but the whole of this ransom is, by French authors, said to have amounted to three hundred thousand crowns. His deliverance was of the greatest importance to Charles, as he was now entirely reconciled to the duke of Burgundy. The Parisians about this time, found themselves so incommoded by Pontoise being again in the hands of the English, had advanced a sum of money to enable Charles to raise an army for reducing it. The siege was accordingly formed, but the regent duke of York, and the lord Talbot offering him battle, he declined it, and withdrew the siege, and the English made a triumphant entry into the place; but not being able to force Charles to a battle, the two generals returned to Roan, as Charles did to Poissi.

Charles, by declining to fight the English, suffered in his reputation with his own subjects; and early in the year 1441, he resolved to retrieve by re-assembling his army, and making a fresh attempt upon Pontoise. By the discipline he had introduced, and by making some seasonable examples of disobedient officers, his troops were now in excellent order; but his regulars, amounting to no more than twelve thousand, were too few for compleatly investing the place, which thereby was open to be revictualled by the English generals. The dauphin, the constable, the princes of the blood, and almost all the noblemen in France, served on this occasion under Charles, who resolved upon a general assault, and dividing his army into three bodies, he gave the command of two to the dauphin and the marshal Loheac, and putting himself at the head of the third, he began the storm with prodigious intrepidity, by being the first to mount the wall in person, and by spreading destruction wherever he fought, fought, so that the place was carried before the dauphin and the marshal made their attacks good. Charles gave no quarter to any he found in arms. Four hundred of the English surrendered themselves, eight hundred were cut in pieces, and two hundred, who endeavoured to make their escape, were put to the sword by la Hire, who was scouring the country with a flying army. During this siege, the lord Talbot failed in an attempt he made upon St. Dennis, while Evereux, and Beaumont, which had English garrisons, were taken by the French.

racy against him

Charles having thus re-established his character in arms, was adored by his subjects, to whom the dauphin set an example of obedience; but Charles was soon plunged into fresh difficulties. The arrival of the duke of Orleans at court did not answer his expectation. That duke had married the duke of Burgundy's neice, a daughter of the duke of Brabant, and the growing intimacy between the two families of Orleans and Burgundy created suspicions in Charles that were far from being groundless. It soon appeared, that, in conjunction with the dukes of Bretagne and Alençon, they were forming schemes for checking the royal authority. Charles who had early intelligence of their designs, forbade the duke of Orleans to appear at his court. This severity, to a prince who had deserved so well of the crown, hurt Charles with the other princes of the blood, and it was given out by the duke of Orleans, that, excepting the dauphin, the constable, and the count of Maine, they were to be excluded from all places of trust or power under Charles. A general meeting of their party was held at Nevers, where they drew up a state of their grievances, one of which was, the aversion which Charles had discovered towards restoring the tranquility of France by concluding a peace with England. The true cause, however, of their discontent, arose from the firmness with which Charles was proceeding in reducing the lords of Poitou, and other countries, to obedience, which the confederate princes interpreted as an invasion upon their rights, and a too great aggrandizement of the royal power. When the paper of their grievances was presented, he answered them, one by one, with the greatest precision, by the bishop of Clermont, and so much to the satisfaction of the duke of Orleans, that he broke off from the confederacy, and not only accepted of an invitation from Charles to return to his court, but endeavoured to make the duke of Burgundy, and the other members of the confederacy, sensible that they had been imposed upon in the opinion they had entertained of Charles and his intentions.

defeated,

Charles, on his part, behaved with admirable prudence and moderation, and avoided every thing that could give the least offence to the dukes of Burgundy or Orleans, to whose public merits he did all imaginable justice, and he dissipated the

the gathering storms so effectually, that in a short time no traces of it remained. He then marched into Languedoc to the assistance of d'Albert, who had been the faithful attendant of his misfortunes through all its vicissitudes. D'Albert had given his son in hostage to the English for the surrender of his town, of Fortas, if not relieved by a certain day, and Charles appearing before the place, within the appointed time with a superior army, which the English declined to fight, they released his son. This gratitude of Charles to an old servant and subject, was of vast service to him, and conciliated the affections of his other subjects to his person.

The English generals did not fail to improve the late divisions of the French court to their own advantage. They received a fresh reinforcement of troops, and their army was divided into four bodies, commanded by the duke of York, the earl of Huntington, and the lords Willoughby and Talbot. As usual, they ravaged all the open country, and after taking some places they returned to Rouen, while Charles took St. Severe, one of the strongest places the English had in Guienne, and put the garrison, consisting of eight hundred men, to the sword. The active lord Talbot had again taken the field against the count of Dunois, to whom he was generally opposed, and had besieged Dieppe; but he was forced to retire to Rouen through the valour of the dauphin, who gained great honour by the relief of the place.

The old countess of Comminges, heiress to that great estate, who had been shut up twenty years in prison by her husband, because she would not make her will in his favour in prejudice of the family of Valois, for whom she said her father had designed it, in case she should die without male heirs. Her husband was Matthew de Foix, brother to the count of that name, and he was joined by the count of Armagnac, who threatened to give his daughter in marriage to Henry VI. of England, if Charles should insist upon his pretensions. The old lady, who was fourscore years of age, had been by Charles delivered out of her confinement, and being at full liberty, she ratified the will that had been made in his favour; but soon after she died. The dauphin received from his father the command of an army to carry the will into execution, which he did so effectually, that Matthew de Foix, the husband, was forced to accept of an annuity out of his wife's estate; and the count of Armagnac was not only stripped of all he held belonging to the Comminges family, but lost great part of his own patrimony.

The count of Armagnac threw himself upon the English interest, retook several places from Charles in conjunction with the count of Foix, and a commission was actually issued for negotiating a marriage between his daughter, and Henry king of England. The lord Talbot had orders to support the count of Armagnac; but Charles acted with such vigour, that his son, and the marshal Lobeac, cut him off from his confederates, and obliged him to throw himself at the feet of the dauphin, who then seized upon all his estate, as well as that of the Comminges.

A truce
with England,

The distracted state of affairs in England at this time, were well known to the court of France, and while Charles appeared to be sunk in sensuality and privacy at Touars, he was planning the means of driving the English entirely out of France. Even while the greatest hostilities between the two nations raged, negotiations for a peace were going forward, and at last a truce was made, which was to continue for twelve months.

A treaty of marriage was, at the same time, on foot between Henry of England, and Margaret, daughter to Renate, the nominal king of Sicily, Naples, and Jerusalem, and duke of Anjou. The chief negotiator was the earl of Suffolk, who is thought himself not to be insensible of the lady's charms, chiefly by the manner in which he conducted the conferences. Renate insisted upon his being put into possession of those parts of Anjou and Maine that were held by the English; in which demand he was gratified by the earl of Suffolk, and the marriage was concluded. This marriage gave great umbrage to that party of the English who were attached to the duke of Gloucester, but we think with very little reason; because the cessions were either nominal, or places that then served only to drain the blood and treasure of England.

p. 65.

We have already seen, that, about this time, Charles readily embraced an invitation made him by the emperor Frederic, to assist him against the Swiss, and that the dauphin, at the head of forty thousand men marched into Alsace, where he cut in pieces four thousand of that people, and seized some cities, which he held in his father's right. The dauphin's auxiliaries were more numerous than the emperor had demanded, and the French troops, who were called Armagnacs, another name for freebooters, paid themselves by ravaging the empire.

Charles

ing in Alsace.

During this expedition, the English shewed great unwillingness to evacuate Anjou and Maine, and the count of Dunois invested Metz, while Charles, with an army, covered the siege, which ended in a capitulation greatly to the advantage of Charles. The dauphin, on the other hand, having now got footing in Alsace, accepted of the mediation of the council of Basil, and concluded the first treaty that ever was made between the cantons of Switzerland and the crown of France; an alliance that was afterwards attended with great consequences. Those wars and expeditions were owing to necessity as well as policy. Charles, by the late truce he had made with England, saw his country exposed to the ravages of a disbanded soldiery, whom he got rid of by employing them in Germany. Upon their return home, he

he resolutely put in execution his scheme of making them submissive to the civil power. He divided them in two Reforms parts; the one, consisting of the best and bravest among his army. them, he retained in his service, in the nature of a standing regular army. The other part, consisting of those who had been bred to, or were fit for, manufactures, or agriculture, he settled in the provinces and towns of his kingdom, and he employed his regulars in clearing the roads from vagabonds of all kinds; so that no Frenchman was left unemployed. He appointed the proper funds for the punctual payment of the troops he kept on foot; and he gratified the officers, who headed them, with posts and pensions, according to their respective ranks and merits. This was deservedly accounted the most glorious measure ever carried into execution by a king of France, and a medal was struck on the occasion.

We have in former parts of this work, and particularly Vol. X. in the history of Italy, mentioned the connections which Charles had beyond the Alps, where he supported Renate duke of Anjou, in his claim upon the crown of Naples; but not so as to hurt his own kingdom. If he did not support the claim of the duke of Orleans upon the Milanese with the utmost vigour, he was justifiable, both from the unsettled state of his own dominions, and from the knowledge he had of that duke's disposition and connections. His generals had seized Final, which belonged to the Genoese, a large party of whom had offered their sovereignty to Charles; but though they deceived him, he shewed no marks of resentment, well knowing, that the inconstancy of the Genoese people and government would soon operate in his favour.

The Genoese were, at that time, at war with Alphonso king of Arragon, who sought to make himself master of their republic; and it was soon seen how well Charles had judged, by the Genoese again offering him the sovereignty of their city, and by their receiving John of Anjou, whom Charles had recommended to them as their governor. He made use of his late accommodation with England as a handle to reduce all the places that had been ceded to the duke of Anjou. He supported the Scots against the English, who, in the year 1448, had lost their ablest and best generals; and such was the prodigality of their court, that Henry was unable to pay the troops he had in France. The duke of Somerset, who had succeeded the duke of York in his command there, was unequal to the employment.

Upon the death of the old duke of Bretagne, his son professed himself so violently in the French interest, that one Surrien, a Spaniard, but a knight of the garter, and entirely devoted to the duke, who was then at variance with the English government, surprized Fougeres, which Charles and the duke of Bretagne construed to be a breach of the truce; and he accordingly made preparations to exterminate the English out of France, though the court of England had actually disavowed Surrien in what he had done, and offered to restore the place to the duke of Bretagne. Charles, however, insisted upon sixteen hundred thousand crowns being paid to that duke by way of indemnification.

He obtains many advantages over the English.

In the mean while, he surprized Pont de l'Arche in the night time, and carried off lord Falconbridge and his garrison prisoners. The loss of that important place was followed by that of many others belonging to the English; but the cautious Charles took care to carry on the war in the name of his ally the duke of Bretagne, and affected great moderation towards the English. His troops, however, took Gerberoy, where they put the English garrison to the sword, Cognac and St. Mesgrim in Guienne. The better to amuse the English, Charles still affected great placability, which imposed so far upon Henry's ministers, that they neglected to repair the fortifications even of the places which still remained in their hands. The truth is, the queen of England and her party were entirely in the French interest, and all motions for acting with vigour were discouraged at that court. James II. was then king of Scotland; his sister the dauphiness was now dead, but he had another sister married to the duke of Bretagne; and the connections between France and Scotland were cemented more strongly than ever.

Upon the expiration of the truce with England, Charles declared war in his own name against the English in France, and almost all the fortresses on the frontiers of Normandy opened their gates to receive his troops. Lord Talbot, then earl of Shrewsbury, was the only officer of great note whom the English had now in the field; but Charles entering Normandy with four different well supplied armies, he was forced to return to Rouen. Charles invited the duke of Burgundy to be a party in the war, but by the advice of his dutchess he wisely declined it; but Charles owed great part of the success of that campaign to the noblemen of Picardy, who were that duke's feudatories. The count of Dunois, who commanded one of the French armies, reduced Harcourt, after a brave defence; and then appeared before Rouen, in order of battle, about the middle of October, at the head of sixty thousand men. Though it was deemed impracticable to form a regular siege at that time of the year, yet Charles, depending upon the affections of the inhabitants, ordered the count to attempt the place by an escalade; but it was disappointed and defeated by the brave earl of Shrewsbury, who commanded in the place.

Rouen reduced.

His ill success took a turn very different from what might have been reasonably expected. The earl, perhaps, was too severe upon the French part of the inhabitants, and such of them as inclined to the English interest began to be apprehensive of the consequence, to themselves and families, if Charles reduced Rouen, as he had done all the other places

he had attempted that campaign. In short, the inhabitants agreed upon a capitulation, as Charles had now brought up all the three armies he had in the field against the place. The duke of Somerſet, Henry's lord lieutenant of France, was then in Rouen, and endeavoured to reſiſt the ſpirit of ſubmitting to Charles; but it was ſo univerſal, that he was obliged to ſend out a deputation, with the archbiſhop of Rouen at its head, to treat of a capitulation. The terms made by the French deputies on both ſides were rejected by the English, and the duke of Somerſet, with the earl of Shrewſbury, prepared to recommence hoſtilities; but the inhabitants took arms and drove all the English from their poſts, excepting an old caſtle, the palace, and the bridge, which were ſoon inveſted on all ſides, while the count of Dunois took poſſeſſion of the reſt of the city. The duke finding that famine muſt oblige him to ſurrender, offered to capitulate, on condition that he and his garrifon, which conſiſted of about twelve hundred men, might retire with their arms and baggage to any place he might chuſe. Charles rejected this condition, and obliged him not only to deliver up Rouen, but Honfleur, and the towns in the Caux. Honfleur was the only place of conſequence on that ſide of the Seine that now remained to the English, and Charles even reduced that before the end of the campaign, which laſted till March 1450.

It happened, unfortunately for the English, that the earl of Reinforce-Shrewſbury had been given up as an hoſtage to Charles for the performance of the capitulation of Rouen, which Curſon, the English governor of Honfleur had reſuſed to ſubmit to, and this gave Charles a colour for detaining the earl; but Honfleur was obliged to ſurrender; ſo that when the French army went into quarters, the only places of importance remaining to the English in both Normandies were Caen, Bayeux, Cherbourg, Vere, and Falaiſe. Sir Thomas Kiriſel, an English general, landed in the ſpring with three thouſand men, and being joined by ſome detachments, he beſieged and took Valogne. He probably would have made a farther progreſs had he not been oppoſed by the count of Clermont, the duke of Bourbon's ſon, who being joined by the army under the conſtable, defeated the English at Fourmigni, with the loſs of three thouſand men, among whom was their commander Kiriſel, taken priſoner. The conſequence of this defeat was the reduction of Vere, Bayeux, Auvranches, and Vologne, by the French, who immediately formed the ſiege of Caen. The beſt troops and generals of France, were employed in this undertaking. The king himſelf took poſt at the abbey of Ardenes. The conſtable, the counts of Dunois, Clermont, Nevers, and Eu, commanded in different quarters of the ſiege. The king of Sicily, and the duke of Alençon were preſent, and the city was ſoon completely inveſted.

Caen besieged and taken.

The city had a noble garrison of four thousand English, with plenty of provisions and ammunition, and the works were in excellent order, so that it was expected the siege would have been a matter of great difficulty. Unhappily for the English, the duke of Somerset, who still acted as Henry's lord lieutenant of France, assumed the command of the garrison; but he was too much under the influence of his wife, who was shut up along with him, and prodigiously frightened. The duke betraying some symptoms of complaisance for her fear, Sir David Hall, deputy to the duke of York, who was hereditary governor of the place, insisted upon taking the command, and while this dispute continued, the French took two bulwarks, and sprung a mine at the gate of St. Stephen, with so great an effect, that Sir David Hall could no longer resist the importunities of the inhabitants, who were encouraged by the duke and dutchess of Somerset; and Charles, who was always wise and moderate, granted the garrison an honourable capitulation; the city was surrendered on the first of July. Falaise and Cherbourg followed the fate of Caen, and before the end of August both Normandies were entirely reduced by Charles, who at last set the earl of Shrewsbury at liberty. The reduction of the two Normandies, which had cost the English such a length of time, and such profusion of blood and treasure, was completed by Charles in twelve months after he began it. His success was greatly owing to the divisions of the English government, which communicated themselves to the English generals and officers in France. But the chief cause of Charles's progress arose from the aversion of the Normans to the English government, which forced the latter upon many impolitic acts of severity; while Charles, on the other hand, behaved with a clemency and mildness that won their affections.

who attacks Guienne,

The reduction of Guienne, or Gascony, was now his great object. The Gascons had been long used to the English government, and were not near so averse to it as the Normans were. The count of Penthievre, and Xaintraille had the command of the expedition that was to reduce it, the constable being left governor of Normandy. They were opposed by the lord Chamois, Sir George Seymour, and Sir John Arundel, whose troops were defeated by the French, who took several places; but their progress not answering the expectation of Charles, he committed the reduction of Gascony to Dunois, then created count of Longueville. The French nobility crowded to the standards of this illustrious commander, and in May 1451, he took Mont Guion, and Blaye, a place of strength, by storm. Among the prisoners made in Blaye, was Montferrand, who was possessed of five strong forts, which he gave up to the French. Dunois then became master, either by surrender or capitulation, of so great great a number of forts as enabled him to form the siege of Fronsac, the strongest place in Guienne, which was far from making so good a defence as was expected; and the French by taking it, had ready access to Bordeaux itself; the inhabitants of which seeing no English army in the field to relieve them, sent a deputation to Dunois, and offered to capitulate, to which they were readily admitted by Dunois. The chief conditions of the capitulation were, that the city and its dependencies should be preserved in all its former rights and privileges, paying no more than its ancient and accustomed taxes: and that Charles should establish a sovereign court of justice, and a mint at Bordeaux.

Dunois, in imitation of his master, by his noble and humane behaviour, captivated the minds of all the French who submitted to him; and on the first of August, he laid siege to Bayonne; which likewise capitulated, through a panic which seized the inhabitants, on account of some extraordinary appearances in the air.

Charles was as unhappy in his own family as he was successful against the English. The dauphin, under a mask of deep dissimulation, still harboured undutiful sentiments towards his father, and hated all who were about him, but above all his favourite mistress, Agnes Sorrel, whom he reported once to have struck on the face. It is to the honour of this lady, that the French historians acknowledge her to have been far superior to the weaknesses incident to women of her character. She was perpetually putting her royal lover in mind of what was due to his name and glory, and rousing him from the indolence to which he was naturally but too subject. The dauphin, after reducing the count of Armagnac, obtained permission from his father to retire to Dauphiny, where he managed, with great address and fidelity, a negotiation with the duke of Savoy; but it was not long before his discontent broke out. Agnes Sorrel had discovered some of his practices, and while the king was besieging Rouen she had followed him to the neighbourhood of that city; but he disregarded her information, and she died, as was thought, of poison, in a few days after.

Charles had a favourite, Pierre de Brese, whom he had appointed seneschal of Poitou. The dauphin demanded that this person, who had an irreproachable character, should be removed from his power, and tried for high treason against the king and state. Charles being resolved, if possible, to avoid coming to extremities with the dauphin, granted his request. De Brese's process was formed; but though he was prosecuted with the utmost malice and acrimony, his innocence was so fully proved, that the king restored him to greater favour than ever, and made him governor of Rouen.

who affects to be independent.

The dauphin, without breaking with his father, affected to act independently in Dauphiny, where he transacted acts of sovereignty, and, not only without his father's knowledge, but against his order, entered into a treaty of marriage with the princess Charlotte, the duke of Savoy's daughter; upon which Charles, all of a sudden, declared war against that prince, and as suddenly made a peace, by which the duke's son married Violante, the king's daughter. This inconsistency of character was soon accounted for.

The Gascons, notwithstanding their reduction to Charles, were still English in their hearts, and they sent Montferrand, with Langland, another lord, to the English council, proposing that they would revolt from the French if they were properly supported. Their proposal was accepted of; the earl of Shrewsbury was made governor of Guienne, and landing in that dutchy with five thousand men, he was soon at the head of a considerable army. Charles having drawn from thence to the frontiers of Savoy the greatest part of his troops, the progress of Talbot was as rapid as that of Charles had been some months before. He took possession of Bordeaux, where he obliged the French commandant and garrison to surrender themselves prisoners of war; and in a short time, being reinforced with four thousand men from England, and a good fleet, he retook Fronsac, with many other places of strength and importance; while Charles, at that advanced season of the year, it being then the middle of November, was in no condition to succour the marshal Jalognes, who acted as deputy for the count of Clermont, his governor of Guienne.

The Gas- cons revolt to the English.

This sudden revolution was effected by the vast difference which the Gascons found between the English and French government. They had, under the former, enjoyed all their feudal rights, which rendered every great lord among them almost independent of any superior. Upon the reduction of Gascony Charles annexed it to the crown, and obliged them to pay the general tax; by which the great landholders lost great part of their revenue, which was now paid to the king, instead of them, and all military dependance of their vassals upon them was abolished. This was done in consequence of Charles's great plan of government for destroying all military relation between subject and subject, and of transferring it to the crown; in which he had been so successful, that Burgundy, and Bretagne, were the only French provinces that still enjoyed their feudal privileges. The duke of the former was too powerful to be reduced, and the latter lay too near England for Charles to provoke the inhabitants. Add to those considerations, that the Gascons complained that the plan of Charles's government was inconsistent with the terms of their capitulation; but the triumph of the English in Guienne was of no long continuance.

Early

Early in the year 1453, the count of Clermont took the The field with twenty-two thousand men, and laid siege to Cha- earl of stillon. The earl of Shrewsbury was then above fourscore years Shrews- of age; and, to gratify the Bourdelois, he marched out of bury de- their city with an intention to raise the siege; but when he feated came to reconnoitre the French camp, it appeared that their and slain. army had been vastly augmented; and that it was too strongly fortified to be attacked by the handful of men he had along with him, who did not exceed six thousand. He sent to Bordeaux for a reinforcement, but the inhabitants reproach- ed him, as if he intended to disfurnish them of troops. He therefore, against his own opinion, resolved to humour the Bourdelois, by attacking the French under all disadvantages: This he did so furiously, that he drove the van of his enemy's army, consisting of four thousand men under Chabannes, one of their best officers, back upon their main body; and probably would have routed the whole, had not his rear been attacked by a body of Bretons, who lay in a separate camp, while the French artillery was disposed so as to gall his men in their front and flanks. He continued, however, to fight bravely; but saw his gallant son, who refused to leave him, killed by his side; and having lost his horse by a cannon- ball, he was soon after dispatched himself by an archer's dagger.

Upon his death, the fortune of the English in France may be said to have died. Seeing their brave general slain, they fled different ways; so that the loss of men they sustained was not very considerable. Chastillon, the garrison of which consisted of fifteen hundred men, surrendered next day; and Charles having joined his army in person, found it amount to sixty thousand men, who soon retook all the places he had lost excepting Bordeaux, which he besieged by sea and land. It was defended by the lord Chamois and a garrison of four thousand English, besides Gascons. Charles, upon the opening of the campaign, had ordered the heads of fourscore Gascons to be struck off as traitors; and it was thought that he was resolved to punish the inhabitants of Bordeaux, when it was taken, with great severity; so that they were determined to make a vigorous defence.

Charles was then in alliance with the king of Castile; Bordeaux by whom, and the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, he was retaken by supplied with a fleet superior to that of the English; which Charles. cut off all supplies to the Bourdelois by sea, on which they depended; so that, being pressed by famine, they offered to capitulate. Charles, finding his army daily decreasing by sickness, granted them terms. The Gascons were to enjoy their effects and estates; the English were at liberty to retire with their effects either to England or Calais; and thirty-two Gascon lords were banished, never to be found again, under pain of death, within the French dominions; but the Gascons and and Bourdelois, from that day, were stripped of all their privileges.

Charles was now at leisure to attend to civil affairs. He ordered the baron le Sparre, one of the exempted Gascon noblemen, to be beheaded for raising commotions. He renewed his treaties with the Swiss cantons and the king of Castile; and he consented to a marriage between the duke of Burgundy's eldest son and the duke of Bourbon's daughter. It has been thought that the French were, at this time, favoured by a private intelligence they carried on with the queen of England.

The wisdom of Charles, and the cunning of the dauphin, continued to be still at variance. That prince's conduct was disrespectful not only to his father but to all the neighbouring princes; especially his father-in-law the duke of Savoy, with whom he was actually at war for the marquisate of Saluces. The patience of Charles being worn out, he sent Chabannes, at the head of an army, into Dauphiny; upon which the dauphin sought to be reconciled to his father-in-law, who refused to give him any countenance; and the dauphin, attended by Montauban and John de Lescun, bastard of Armagnac, took refuge in the duke of Burgundy's dominions. That prince ordered his eldest son, the count de Charolois, to compliment the dauphin upon his arrival; but desired to be excused from seeing him without his father's approbation.

The situation of Charles, at this time, was affecting. He, at once, loved, dreaded, and distrusted his son; but he consented to the duke of Burgundy's shewing him all the kindness and honours he thought proper. The dauphin pretended to pay the most profound submission to his father's person; but demanded from the duke of Burgundy a force sufficient to remove his ministers. The duke not only refused to gratify him in this, but advised him, by all means, to submit to his father; which the dauphin, at last, consented to, and retired to Genep, in Hainault, where he lived upon an allowance of three thousand florins a month, which his father gave him, with a promise of augmenting it according to his behaviour.

The duke of Burgundy was uneasy at his own situation; because, being no stranger to the dispositions of the dauphin, he foresaw that he must, in time, break either with the father or the son. He proposed to Charles to send the dauphin with a body of troops to check the formidable progress of the Turks; but Charles declined trusting him with an army, and invited him to his court, with an offer to replace him in all the privileges and honours due to his birth; but he chose still to reside in the duke of Burgundy's dominions, where he was treated with such distinctions as, at last, gave umbrage to Charles.

The duke of Alençon having been formerly pressed for money, had sold Fougères to the duke of Bretagne; but he now practises

wanted to redeem it by making a tender of the purchase-money, which the duke of Bretagne refused. Alençon first complained to Charles, who gave him no satisfaction; and then to the court of England, especially to the duke of York, who, at this time, governed it, and encouraged a treaty of marriage between the duke of Alençon's daughter and his son. As the duke of York, no doubt, was then concerting the means of making his claim good to the crown of England, he readily entered into the proposal made by the duke of Alençon for putting the English once more in possession of Normandy.

During this negotiation, the duke of Alençon drew up a scheme of the invasion, and gave it to a domestic, who, instead of carrying it in a hollow stick, as directed, to the duke of York, carried it to Charles, who appeared deeply affected with so striking a discovery; but, without losing time, he ordered his faithful old servant, the count of Longueville, to march with an army into the duke's estates, and to put him under an arrest; which he accordingly did, and carried him prisoner to Paris; where Charles ordered him to be tried by his peers for high-treason. The duke of Burgundy was summoned to sit at the trial, which was very solemn and fair, as condemned first peer of France; but he did not attend; and the duke of Alençon was, upon full evidence, condemned to lose his peers' head.

There is some reason for believing the duke of Burgundy to have been privy to the conspiracy, but Charles affected to clear both him and the dauphin from every charge of that kind. The duke of Burgundy, however, did not succeed in his application to Charles to pardon Alençon; though, at the petition of the constable, the count of Richmont, now duke of Bretagne, he changed his sentence into perpetual imprisonment in the castle of Loches, from which he was delivered in the next reign.

Charles, to find employment for the English at home, prevailed with the Scots to invade England by land; and, on the twentieth of August, 1457, his admiral, de Bresse, took and plundered Sandwich and the town of Fowey in Cornwall, and then returned to France, after having greatly alarmed the court and nation of England, where a general opinion prevailed that the invasion had been encouraged by queen Margaret.

Charles, being apprehensive of a new war with England in case the duke of York should succeed in his claim, and having lost the duke of Bretagne, who, to the day of his death, retained the constable's sword, strengthened himself with new alliances, particularly with Spain and Denmark; and the rather, because his jealousy of the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy encreased every day. Charles, to disable the dauphin, deprived him of all his remaining authority in Dauphiny; and, without regarding the murmurs of the people, ple, he deprived its states of all the marks of independency they had enjoyed under the dauphin ; such as those of holding parliaments, making alliances with foreign powers, and coining money ; and reannexed the province to his crown. To divide the dauphin from the duke of Burgundy, he expressed for him the greatest marks of affection, and wrote him a letter of felicitation, with his own hand, upon the birth of his son, and most tenderly invited him to his court. When his differences with the duke of Burgundy were so high, that the duke presented him with a list of his grievances, the king answered them article by article, and did not fail highly to applaud the duke for the respect and favour he had shewn to the dauphin. Nothing, however, could reconcile that prince to his duty ; and Charles every day had fresh reasons for distrusting him. To have proceeded against him with severity, might have driven him to take refuge in England, and to have kindled a civil-war in France ; and all the poor comfort he had was, that the duke of Burgundy was in much the same situation with his son the count of Charolois, who was equally disobedient, and threatened every day to throw himself under the king's protection.

Duke of York The duke of York, by this time, had avowed his claim upon the crown of England ; which alarmed Charles so much, that he had some thoughts of sending over a body of troops to the assistance of Henry, and to have given the command of them to the count of Charolois. It was insinuated to Charles, that the young prince would only employ those troops against his father or his ministers ; and he therefore, though then very ill, wrote him a letter, with his own hand, acquainting him, that he would not, for two such crowns as his own, be accessory to a base action.

Death, This was among the last actions of Charles's life, which was finished by a most miserable fate. He had received an intimation that his son intended to poison him, which made so deep an impression upon him, that he refused all food for several days ; and, when he wanted to eat, it was perceived that he had lost the power of swallowing ; which put an end to his life on the twenty-second of July, 1460, in the thirty-ninth year of his reign, and the sixtieth of his age.

Character, Nothing can give us a higher opinion of his great abilities for government, than by comparing the flourishing state of his kingdom at the time of his death with the low state of his finances at the time of his accession ; when they were so much exhausted, that, not having money to pay for a pair of boots, the tradesman carried them away. He was, indeed, perhaps, better served by his generals and ministers than any prince we read of in history ; but that circumstance, far from abating his merits as a king, serves to exalt them ; as they prove, at once, his judgment in choosing, and resolution in protecting, his servants. On all necessary occasions, he gave undeniable proofs of his intrepidity and personal courage.

courage. He new modelled the parliaments of France, which, in his time, retained but few of their antient forms; for he made the great officers of the crown members of them; and he admitted the treasurers of France and the lay-deputies to sit as judges, along with the peers, at the trial of the duke of Alencon, at which he himself presided. He had the art of endearing himself to his people; so that even the depraved state of the coin under him, which he raised and lowered according to his own conveniency, was of little or no prejudice to his affairs; because his subjects took it and circulated it among themselves, notwithstanding all the alterations it underwent.

The greatest reproach upon his reign was the treatment which James Cœur, who was his goldsmith, or cashier, met with. This Cœur was the greatest genius of his age in the art of financing; and, by his vast knowledge of trade, he amassed so great a fortune, that the ignorance of the times reckoned him among those who enjoyed the secret of the philosopher's stone; though it was no other than that possessed by the house of Medici, a profound acquaintance with all the branches of commerce. This person had been accused of being accessory to the death of Agnes Sorrel; a charge from which he was honourably acquitted; and his credit was so great, that he supplied the king with money, though without any detriment to himself, for driving the English out of France. His wealth, at last, is said to have exceeded that of any subject in Europe, and brought upon him a fresh prosecution, which ended in the forfeiture of his land, and his being condemned to pay a fine of four hundred thousand crowns; but the parliament afterwards declared him to be innocent. It is certain, however, that he could not have amassed so immense an estate as he did without being guilty of some species of speculation, though we are told that the public money he employed was always previously due to himself as the king's chief creditor. After his process was finished, he retired to the island of Cyprus; where, by the arts of commerce, he grew more wealthy than ever.

Charles the Wise, or, as some call him, the Well-served, and issue, can be said to have been unhappy in nothing but his son. He of Charles made even his private failings subservient to his greatness; VII. because it inspired his generals and ministers with emulation, as he engrossed to himself no part of the glory they acquired by their services. Through uncommon good fortune, his queen, Mary of Anjou, who loved him with the greatest affection, gave him but little disquiet in his amours; and she and his mistress, Agnes Sorrel, seemed to rival one another only in contending who should contribute most to his glory. His legitimate children were, Lewis, who succeeded him; Philip, duke of Berry; Violante, married to the duke of Savoy;

voy; Catharine, wife to Charles the Hardy, duke of Burgundy; Joan, married to the duke of Bourbon; and Magdalen, the wife of Gaston, count of Foix. By Agnes Sorrel he had three daughters; Charlotte, who was stabbed by her husband, James de Breize, count of Maulevrier, upon finding her in the act of adultery; Margaret, who was married to Oliver de Coetivi; and Jane, the wife of Anthony de Bueil, count of Sancerre.

Lewis XI.

Accession
of Lewis.

WE now enter on the history of a prince whose character was made up of inconsistencies, and is the most unamiable of any we meet with in the French annals. Tannequi du Chastel, the most early favourite of Charles VII. performed his master's obsequies at his own expence; and Charles of Anjou, the dauphin's uncle, by his mother, sent that prince intelligence of his father's death; which, notwithstanding his profound dissimulation, he received with an indecent joy. From his innate jealousy, he conceived a surmise that his succession would be disputed; and he was attended to his coronation by the duke of Burgundy and his son. During the ceremony he fell upon his knees before the duke and received from him the honour of knighthood; after which, that duke performed his homage to Lewis, as first peer of France, in the most ample manner. He entered Paris with a very magnificent escort, and met with no appearance of any unfavourable disposition to his right, either among the nobles or the people. He heard all that the duke of Burgundy and the other great men about him said, with mildness and complacency; but he followed his own will; for, in direct contradiction of what they advised, he displaced most of his father's ministers; particularly the chancellor, Juvenal des Ursins, the admiral, and part of the parliament. He declared the count of Charolois his lieutenant in Normandy; and, because the duke of Alençon had conspired against the late king, he released him from his confinement.

His policy
and ingrati-
tude.

Lewis appeared to be fully sensible of the great services done him by the duke of Burgundy; and, before his accession, he frequently exclaimed against a confederacy that had been made between his father, Charles VII. and the Liegeois, against that duke, for protecting himself, and promised to dissolve it when he came to the crown; but, instead of that, to the amazement of all the world, he confirmed it. After receiving the homage of the duke of Bretagne, under pretence of a pilgrimage into his country, he stole away the princess of Bretagne, but was obliged to set her at liberty. Though fully convinced of the expediency and utility of the pragmatic sanction, for the benefit of the Gallican church,

yet he had such a passion for establishing John of Anjou, duke of Calabria, upon the throne of Naples, that, in order to gain the friendship of pope Pius II. he cancelled that famous instrument, discharged his attorney-general from his service for presuming to enforce it in parliament; but, at the same time, he encouraged the members to carry it into execution, and largely indemnified the attorney-general for the loss of his place. The people of Rheims rose against the taxes he imposed; but he soon quelled the insurrection by executing fourscore of the ringleaders.

Lewis affected to be inscrutable in his politics, which State of were dark, bloody, and crooked, but tending to the esta- England.
blishment of one point, that of arbitrary authority in his own person and family. In this he was greatly assisted by the state of England, the most formidable foe of the French monarchy. Edward IV. was then upon that throne, having deposed Henry VI. whose queen, Margaret of Anjou, was now an exile, and a suppliant for assistance to restore her husband. She was seconded by her father, mother, the count of Maine, and the ambassadors from Scotland; but all she obtained from Lewis was a loan of twenty thousand livres; which were either to be repaid by Henry in specie, or by the rendition of the town of Calais, as soon as he should be restored to his dignity.

If we are to believe the French historians, Breze, the seneschal of Normandy, was touched with her charms, and procured two thousand men for her service, with whom he set sail from the ports of Bretagne. We cannot, however, imagine that he did this without the privacy of Lewis, whose dissimulation would not suffer him to countenance the undertaking; and it is said that the duke of Bretagne publicly favoured her cause. Breze's expedition was unfortunate: his ships were wrecked or dissipated by storms, and not above five hundred of his men arrived in England, where they were able to do no effectual service, though they bravely defended the castle of Alnwick against the earl of Warwick. The queen of England again escaped to the duke of Burgundy's dominions, as the Scots, who knew that Lewis was not fond of a war with England, were backward in assisting her. As to Lewis, he complimented Edward IV. on his accession; and the count of Charolois proposed a marriage between himself and Edward's sister.

All the obligations that Lewis lay under to the duke of Burgundy, or that his father owed to the duke of Bretagne, of Lewis.
were now forgot by him, and he laid a deep plan for re-annexing the dominions of both to the crown of France. But being sensible he could not succeed in this without making Edward IV. his friend, that prince was courted by him, and by the two dukes, at the same time. In the mean while, he sent James de Armagnac, duke of Nemours, to the assistance of James, king of Arragon; whose subjects, as we shall see in the proper place, had rebelled against him ; and he lent that prince three hundred thousand crowns on the mortgage of Roussillon and Cerdagne. Thus Lewis became great through the divisions of his neighbours. As corruption was the ruling principle of Lewis's government, he thought that the subjects of no other prince could withstand it, and that money could force his secrets from any of his ministers ; for which reason he trusted none ; nor did the public ever know of any resolution he formed till it was carried into execution.
in

Mean appearance of Lewis.

Having undertaken to mediate between the kings of Castile and Arragon, he had an interview with the former ; but both he and his attendants were dressed so meanly, that the Castilians, who were most magnificently habited, despised them ; while Lewis undervalued them for the value they seemed to place on pomp and shew ; and this interview is said to have created an irreconcilable difference between the two nations ; for the award of Lewis equally disgusted the Castilians and the Arragonese.

A match had been as good as concluded between the lady Bona of Savoy, who was the chief ornament of the French court, and king Edward. The treaty of marriage was to be managed by the famous earl of Warwick, who had placed king Edward on the throne, but whom Lewis had gained over with money, as he had done the ministers of all the princes his neighbours. The lady Bona was sister to his queen, and the earl visited the court of France with a most superb attendance, while Dammartin was sent as plenipotentiary from Lewis to England. Edward disappointed the negotiation by marrying one of his own subjects, and this created a coldness between the two courts of France and England ; and a private, but irreconcilable, aversion in the earl of Warwick, with the persons both of Edward and his consort.

Confederacy against him.

Edward being sensible how deeply he had offended Lewis, sought to strengthen himself by a closer alliance with the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne ; in which he afterwards succeeded to his wish : but, in the mean while, Lewis, by making a party against the count de Charolois, the head of which was John de Croy, redeemed the towns upon the Somme, which had been pledged to the duke ; but, as he did nothing in an upright manner, he turned out their governors contrary to his engagements with the duke, though he replaced them with others that were equally agreeable to that prince.

In 1463, Philip, son to the duke of Savoy, forced his father, whom he expelled from his dominions, to throw himself upon the protection of Lewis. The latter, with a view of reconciling the father and son, invited Philip, under a safe conduct, to repair to his court ; where he was no sooner arrived than Lewis shut him up a prisoner in the castle of Loches, Loches, and sent back the duke to the government of his dominions.

When Philip the Hardy was married to Margaret of Flanders, three towns, as we have already seen, had been added to the duke of Burgundy; but Lewis now demanded them, to the great disgust of that duke. Lewis, who had a vast opinion of his own personal address in the management of a negotiation, demanded a conference with the duke at Hedin; but his true intention was to have seized the person of the count of Charolois in his return from the Hague, by means of a ruffian, one Rubempre, and then of the duke himself at Hedin. This flagitious design miscarried through the notoriety of Rubempre's deceitful character, which occasioned his being apprehended in the Low Countries. Lewis affected great displeasure that the duke's subjects should give him out as the author of this attempt; and not only demanded justice upon some of them, but that Rubempre should be set at liberty: a demand which the duke and his son treated with the utmost contempt; and the count openly threatened to be revenged.

The archbishop of Narbonne, who had been Lewis's ambassador on this occasion, having reported the count's threats to Lewis, they threw him into great perplexity; but before he was able to come to a knowledge of the truth, half of France was ready to take arms against him. A marriage between king Edward's sister, Margaret, and the count of Charolois, was as good as concluded. The antient treaties between England and the dukes of Bretagne and Burgundy were renewed. Those two princes confederated with the dukes of Berry, Bourbon, and Calabria; and their league was still that of the public good. The pretext for this confederacy has been often touched upon in this history; we mean the great increase of the power of the crown in prejudice of the privileges of the princes of the blood, and the French nobility, of whom the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne were the only bulwarks. Never was a confederacy, in which so many were concerned, carried on with greater address and secrecy; and, at the same time, more publicly managed; for the parties met in churches and places of common resort, where they knew they could be the least suspected, by the king's numerous spies, to be treating of so dangerous an affair. The agents were generally Bretons, disguised like monks and friars, and employed by the duke of Bretagne's ministers, who were men of address and abilities.

Many causes concurred to render the confederacy successful. The chief was, that Lewis had disgraced and displaced, from the management of public affairs, all the nobility, as against well as his father's late ministers, whose places he had filled from the dregs of the people, with men of characters similar to his own; particularly cardinal Balus, his first minister.

This abuse of power was so flagrant, that even the count of Longueville, and the most zealous friends of the crown in the late reign, entered into the confederacy, as did the count of Armagnac, notwithstanding the obligations he lay under to Lewis for his liberty.

While those allies for the public-good were preparing for action, Lewis was upon his march against the duke of Bretagne, accompanied by his brother the duke of Berry. The duke of Bretagne turned the arts of Lewis against himself. He sent a minister to amuse him with propositions for a treaty; Lewis sought to corrupt that minister, who took his money, but remained faithful to his master, and carried off the duke of Berry to the confederates.

This was the first intimation which Lewis had of his danger. The duke of Berry published a manifesto, exposing the ruined state of France through his brother's administration; and pleaded the most specious of all causes, that of the public good, as an excuse for the confederacy. Lewis, who had abilities, when he directed them properly, and was personally very brave, might have lost his crown on this occasion, had it not been for the great party he had among the burghers and the common people of France, who did not wish to see a revival of the feudal powers. He had on his side the city of Paris, and he was secure of the towns upon the Somme. He fell upon the duke of Bourbon, whom he quickly reduced, and then marched to defend Paris against the count of Charolois, who was in full march against it through Picardy. The count of Charolois was not joined by the Breton army, and was so resolutely opposed by the Parisians, that, though he forced the bridge of St. Cloud, he gained no material advantage, and was obliged to retire.

The king was then at Mont l'Hery with his army; but there was still room for negotiation; and neither party had any thoughts of engaging. The king piqued Peter de Breze, who commanded his van-guard, by demanding whether he had any correspondence with the heads of the league; and de Breze thought he could not clear himself so effectually as by fighting, which he did without orders, and the battle soon became general. Both sides fought bravely, but neither could justly claim the victory, though Lewis shewed himself to be an able general, by rallying his troops, and retreating, in good order, towards Paris; which was, to him, next to a victory: while Charolois marched to Estampes, where he was joined by the confederates, and particularly by a body of Swiss, under the command of the duke of Calabria; so that the army of the confederates amounted to an hundred thousand men.

The confederates, being thus reinforced, marched again to Paris; which they certainly would have taken, had it not been for the personal valour of Lewis, who defended it; but, but, had he not been favoured by the bad discipline and want of subordination among the allies, he must have been obliged to have retired to Milan or Switzerland. The heads of the league soon perceived that it was composed of so many jarring interests, that it would be impossible to reconcile them, even if they were successful against Lewis; and that the independency which every great lord affected in military matters, must render the whole abortive.

Those, and a variety of other considerations, inclined the count of Charolois, who was considered as the chief leader of the confederacy, to listen to a proposal made by Lewis for a negotiation, and, at last, to consent to an interview with him. Upon their meeting, Lewis demanded whether his person was safe; and, upon the count's assuring him it was, he entirely delivered himself into his hands, facetiously telling him, that he knew him to be a man of honour, because he had been so punctual in performing the promise he had made him by the archbishop of Narbonne. As Lewis was previously resolved not to keep any treaty he should make, he made little or no hesitation about the terms; and an accommodation was soon concluded at Conflans with the count of Charolois, on the fifth of October; as another was with the other confederates at St. Aaur, on the twenty-ninth: but, at the same time, he declared to his confidants, that he had concluded both through necessity; and protested against their validity.

Lewis affected now to behave with great openness. He brought over the duke of Bourbon from the confederates. He entered into a separate negotiation with the duke of Bretagne, who was then embroiled with the duke of Berry, whom Lewis drove out of Normandy. During the late civil-war, as it may be called, Lewis had encouraged the Liegeois, and the inhabitants of Dinant, to make a diversion in his favour. The latter were the duke of Burgundy's immediate subjects, and, being abandoned by Lewis and the Liegeois, the count of Charolois was employed in massacring the Dinanters, and destroying their city; while Charles was stripping his brother of all he held in France, and forced him to take refuge at the duke of Bretagne's court; where he was obliged to pawn his plate for subsistence, and was treated with the simple appellation of Monsieur, the king's brother.

Lewis having thus gained a breathing-time, employed it to the best advantage. He instigated the Liegeois, who were then very powerful, to a new insurrection against the duke of Burgundy; and he would have carried his arms into the heart of Bretagne, had he not been afraid of throwing that prince into the arms of Edward, and thereby provoking an invasion from England. He knew that the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne had renewed their engagements with Edward; and he sent the count of Roussillon, then admiral of France, to counter-act them at the court of London. The duke duke of Bretagne artfully made use of this incident to prevail with Edward to set on foot a negotiation ; by which he was saved through the indecision of Lewis, who might have then made himself master of Bretagne.

Great policy of
Lewis.

The king of England having thus saved the duke of Bretagne, broke with the earl of Warwick, who retired to France ; where he was treated by Lewis, who well knew his vast power in England, as his equal. Some time before this, Philip, surnamed the Good, duke of Burgundy, died ; and left his son, Charles, count of Charolois, heir to his great estates. The politics of Lewis now took another turn. He knew the duke to be his irreconcilable enemy, and he offered to withdraw his assistance from the Liegeois, if the other would withdraw his from the duke of Bretagne, upon whose ruin Lewis was inflexibly bent ; but the duke of Burgundy nobly rejected the proposal, and, soon after, to the great mortification of Lewis, defeated the Liegeois in a bloody engagement.

Among other stipulations in the treaties of Conflans and St. Maur, it was provided, that an enquiry should be made into all grievances, and that they should be redressed. The allies, at that time, little thought that this stipulation would be turned against themselves. They, no doubt, meant the grievances which the people suffered from the king ; but Lewis construed it (and, indeed, we think not without justice) in a general sense ; for he established commissioners for enquiring into the abuses of the vast powers which the princes of the blood and the nobility still retained in their respective estates. This conduct was attended with great success for Lewis, who thereby humbled the confederates and acquired popularity. He gave the constable's staff of France, together with his wife's sister in marriage, to the count of St. Paul, of the house of Luxembourg, in hopes of detaching him from his connections with the duke of Burgundy ; and he took Dammartin into favour, with several of his father's old servants, whom he had formerly disgraced ; expecting that this alteration of his conduct would strengthen his interest among the nobility, which it certainly did.

By this time, the duke of Bretagne, assisted by the duke of Alençon, and secure of assistance from England, had recovered some part of his dominions ; and Edward, in the treaty he made with that duke, had promised to assist him with three thousand archers. Lewis raised two armies. He gave the one to his admiral, who marched against Bretagne ; and he entered Picardy in person at the head of the other : but such was his indecision in the proposals of peace which he either made or received, that his progress was inconsiderable.

confederacy
against
him,

By the force of money, Lewis discovered that the great aim of the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, was, that Normandy should be dismembered from the crown of France and given to the duke of Berry. Lewis, in warding off this blow,

blow, shewed the most masterly talents. He convoked an assembly of his states at Tours, where he religiously laid before them the state of the differences between himself and the two dukes; and, with great strength of reasoning, shewed the fatal consequence that must attend the dismemberment of Normandy from his crown. In short, he proved, that, if the duke of Berry should become master of Normandy, he, with the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, backed by the power of England, would form a triumvirate strong enough to give laws to the rest of the kingdom, and throw France back into all the miseries she had suffered under his grandfather John and Philip of Valois. Lewis, at the same time, inveighed against the oppressions which the people suffered under the nobility; and expressed the most ardent zeal for having them removed. The assembly was convinced by his reasons, and entered into his views. The annexing Normandy for ever to the crown of France was declared to be a fundamental law of the monarchy; and they came to several very dutiful resolutions in support of his person and government.

This declared attachment of the states to Lewis was attended with favourable consequences to his foreign affairs; for it opened the king of England's eyes with regard to the real designs of the two dukes, to which, till then, he had been a stranger; and cooled the good understanding between him and them, though the duke of Burgundy was now actually married to his sister. The hands of Lewis were likewise strengthened at home. He punished the count of Maine for having secretly corresponded with the confederates; but he sent to the duke of Calabria, who was poor, and had openly joined them, a sum of money for the relief of himself and family. He ordered Dammartin's estates, which had been confiscated, and given, in the beginning of his reign, to Charles de Melun, grand-master of his household, to be restored to him; and Melun was tried and executed, as were several others, who had fallen under his displeasure.

Lewis thinking himself now firmly fixed at home, and knowing that the English parliament was far from being well affected towards the duke of Burgundy, proceeded in his operations against Bretagne; which he committed to the duke of Calabria; while he himself covered Normandy with another army. The duke of Bretagne had not then been joined by his English auxiliaries. He demanded assistance from the duke of Burgundy; and it is said, that, such was the force of money employed by Lewis, that the couriers of the two dukes carried their dispatches to him instead of their masters. This is the more probable, as the duke of Burgundy was on the point of hanging the herald who brought him, from Lewis, the intelligence of the treaty which he afterwards made with the duke of Bretagne. Be this as it will, it is certain that, on the seventeenth of September, the duke of Calabria forced the duke of Bretagne to agree to a treaty ; by which Lewis was to pay to his brother, the duke of Berry, an annuity of thirty-six thousand livres ; but the most extraordinary article of this treaty was, that the duke of Bretagne should renounce all alliances made in prejudice of France, and particularly that which he had made with the duke of Burgundy.

When this article was laid before the duke of Burgundy, he immediately apprehended that he was sacrificed by his ally to Lewis ; and he accepted of an invitation made him, by cardinal Balue, to enter into a negotiation with Lewis, who earnestly desired it ; having been flattered by his courtiers, that he was so able a negotiator, that it was impossible to resist his art and address. He was so much intoxicated with this opinion, that he outwitted himself, by affecting a generosity and openness which was the very reverse of his nature. In hopes of conquering every distrust the duke could have of his sincerity, and thereby obtaining from him what he pleased, he appointed Peronne, one of the duke's garrison towns, for the place of negotiation ; and he entered it attended only by three domestics.

His reception by the duke was answerable to his expectation ; but, upon the arrival of prince Philip of Savoy and some French exiles, Lewis began to be apprehensive of his safety. Instead of making his escape, which was still in his power, he desired to be lodged in the castle, in which he was indulged. While he resided there, an account came that the agents of Lewis had prevailed upon the Liegeois to take arms, to make their bishop, the duke's brother-in-law, prisoner, after putting to death six of his canons, to surprize Tonges, and to put its garrison to the sword.

The duke, upon this, made such dispositions about the king's person, that he perceived he was a prisoner. Lewis always trusted to money as his only friend, and he had brought a large quantity of it along with him. Notwithstanding the prodigious agitation of his spirits, he applied his gold so liberally, and so artfully, among the duke's courtiers and counsellors, that he was prevailed upon to have another interview with the king, and to let him know on what terms he might purchase his life, if not his liberty.

When they met, Lewis agreed to every thing proposed ; particularly, that his brother, the duke of Berry, should be put into possession of Champagne and Bree ; and he even consented to march in the duke's army against the Liegeois. He still, however, found himself a prisoner and strictly guarded. The Liegeois made a desperate sally, in which they had almost carried him off and the duke ; but being repulsed, the king was carried to the attack, in which the city was stormed,

ed, and then the duke suffered him to depart. After which, he put the inhabitants to the sword, almost without exception, and reduced the town to ashes.

We have few instances in history of a prince, like Lewis, His majesty possessed of wisdom and penetration, who abused them so grossly, as he did, by over-refining them. This was so obvious to the meanest of his subjects, that he became the object of their ridicule. They taught their jays and magpies the word Peronne, which they incessantly repeated, till Lewis ordered all of them to be destroyed; but not without commanding a list of their owners names to be brought him. At the same time, he published proclamations, that no one should speak ill of the duke of Burgundy; who, upon their parting, had assured him, that, if his brother was not contented with his appanage of Champagne and Brie, he would take no farther concern in his affairs; but begged, if possible, that he might be made easy. Upon this, Lewis persuaded his brother to accept of the dutchy of Guienne instead of his proposed appanage, as it put him in a situation far less dangerous to the public repose.

The peculiarly timid disposition of Lewis unfolded itself His ministers more and more every day; and encouraged such of his ministers as knew him best, to encrease his difficulties by keeping a correspondence with his enemies. He had raised the cardinal Balue from the lowest, to the highest, station of a subject; and he and the bishop of Verdun, a man of the same ungrateful, perfidious disposition as the cardinal, had entered into a secret correspondence with the court of Rome and the duke of Burgundy, that, by pointing out to them the weak parts of their master's disposition and government, they might render themselves the more necessary to his affairs. The person entrusted with this correspondence was seized as a spy, by which means their treason was revealed to Lewis: but, though they were arrested and convicted, partly even upon their own confessions, yet the terror of the court of Rome hung so strongly upon Lewis, that he durst not put them to death, but shut them both in iron cages of eight feet square: a mode of confinement which they themselves had devised for others.

The discovery and punishment of this correspondence was of service to Lewis; as it made his brother, the duke of Guienne, the more pliable. He was treated by Lewis with great marks of affection and regard; and he was made his first knight of the order of St. Michael; which he instituted at this time, probably that he might keep his great men, who were bound to it by the oath of the institution, firm to his dignity and interest against all persons whatever. He even proposed a match between the duke his brother and the princess of Castile; by which he might have mounted that throne had the marriage taken place.

Lewis thought himself happy in this short respite he had from domestic trouble. He encouraged the Catalans in their revolt under his nephew, the duke of Calabria, from the king of Arragon; who was thereby disabled from recovering the counties of Roussillon and Cerdagne, which were still in the possession of Lewis. The duke of Burgundy had an only daughter, who was the greatest heiress in Europe; and it was probably with an eye to a match between her and the duke of Guienne that he had fixed Champagne and Brie as that prince's appanage. It gave him a sensible disquiet, when he understood that it was altered into Guienne; and the duke of Guienne himself preferred the match to that with the princess of Castile.

Lewis, to sound the duke of Bretagne, offered him his order of St. Michael; but he declined it on account of the oath annexed to it. The duke of Burgundy was not so scrupulous with regard to that of the garter, which he accepted of from Edward IV. in the winter of the year 1469. That prince relying upon his connections with the dukes of Guienne and Bretagne, had disbanded his army; and the great revolution which now happened in England, gave a new face to the affairs of Lewis. The earl of Warwick, whose daughter the duke of Clarence, brother to Edward IV. had married, had been obliged to dismiss his army; and intended to have repaired to Calais, of which he was governor; but he was denied admission into the place: upon which he turned pirate with the ships under his command.

As he had a secret correspondence with Lewis, that prince not only winked at his piracies, but ordered some of his ships to join him; though, with his usual policy, he pretended they were fitted out to suppress him. The duke of Burgundy, whose subjects were the chief sufferers, discovering the collusion, wrote a letter, with his own hand, to the archbishop of Narbonne, Lewis's first minister, and the admiral of France, in the following remarkable terms:

Remarkable letter of the duke of Burgundy. “The vessels which you told me the king had put to sea against the English, have fallen upon my subjects, in their return to my dominions; but, by St. George, if you do not take care of them, with the help of God, I will. Nor will I mind your apologies, or your reasons for your justification, which are too stiff and long winded.”

By this time, though the house of Lancaster was fallen so low that the duke of Exeter, one of its princes, was begging his bread, bare-footed, in the streets of Brussels; and Henry's queen, with her children, wanted the common necessities of life; yet Lewis approved of a scheme, formed by the house of Warwick, for restoring Henry to his throne. They agreed that their joint fleets should make a descent upon England. The subjects of the duke of Burgundy still continuing to suffer by the earl of Warwick's depredations, he wrote wrote a letter to the parliament of Paris; in which he railed against the king; complained of the violation of the treaty of Peronne; and threatened, that, if the earl did not leave France, and order his ships from his coasts, he would come at the head of an army, and drag him from whatever place he should take shelter in.

The parliament, the members of which were then overjoyed at the news of the birth of a dauphin, treated his insolence with proper contempt; upon which, he gave orders for his fleet to join that of Edward; and, in conjunction, they formed a force superior to any that Warwick and Lewis could put to sea. Notwithstanding this, the French admiral amused La Veer, the admiral of Burgundy, so artfully, that the earl of Warwick escaped with his ships to England. He carried with him a few Frenchmen; and it is well known how he replaced Henry upon that throne.

Birth of a
dauphin.

Lewis, in the mean while, summoned an assembly of his great lords at Tours, but took care to have an army in readiness under the constable, to execute any decrees the members might make. The duke of Burgundy's late proceedings were warmly complained of by the count of Eu, and being supported by many aggravations, he was by the assembly ordered to appear before the parliament as a peer of France. Though the duke of Burgundy treated this summons with the utmost indignity, yet the constable, the count of St. Paul, took St. Quintin, before the duke was prepared to face him in the field, and made such progress in Piccardy, where Amiens likewise surrendered to him, that the duke of Bretagne made his submissions to Lewis, who was sure that his brother, the duke of Guienne, would not oppose him. Thus this formidable triumvirate received a severe blow; for the duke of Burgundy was, at the same time, deserted by his natural brother Baldwin, in whom he had always reposed the greatest confidence. The duke of Burgundy hearing of his repeated losses, for Roie and Montdidier had by this time surrendered, repaired with five hundred horse to Arras, where he raised an army, but sent the most reproachful messages to the duke of Guienne, and the constable, upbraiding them for their ingratitude. Both the constable and the duke of Bretagne advised him to give his daughter in marriage to the duke of Guienne, but he rejected their advice, and though Edward IV. had been driven out of England, he trusted to the connections he had formed with the Lancaster family, and to the validity of the league with England, which he believed must hold good under every government. In short, he resolved to negotiate with Lewis, rather than be obliged to obey the dictates of his own friends. He treated, however, at the head of an army, and having passed the Somme, he sent a very dutiful letter to the king, informing him that he had been been imposed upon, when he was persuaded to declare against him.

A truce. The dispositions of Lewis were pretty similar to those of the duke; but a fresh revolution in England again altered the face of affairs; for, by the assistance he had offered to Edward IV. who had been driven to Holland, that prince recovered the throne of England by defeating Henry at the battle of Barnet, where the earl of Warwick was killed. A truce had been concluded for a year between Lewis, and the duke of Burgundy, who made use of it to regain the confidence of his old friends, by seeming to agree to the marriage of his daughter to the duke of Guienne, and by even sending the bishop of Montauban to solicit the pope for a dispensation. It is uncertain whether he was sincere in this, or did it to obtain the better terms from Lewis, who believed him to be in earnest. He sent one of his ministers, Bouchage, to expostulate with the duke of Guienne upon the breach of what he had sworn, when he promised upon the cross never to consent to that match. Edward IV. represented to the duke of Burgundy at the same time, the danger to which England must be exposed from that marriage, if the duke of Guienne should ever succeed to the crown of France, which was no unlikely event.

Death of the duke of Guienne It seems almost certain, that Lewis was convinced the match would soon take place, and that he employed one Favois Vesois, a Benedictine monk, who was his brother's confessor, to poison him, which he actually did, while the duke sat at supper with Montforan, his favourite mistress. The poison was served up in a dish of fish. The lady died immediately. A brave nobleman, who was called de Lescun, seized the poisoner, and carried him to Bretagne, where he was tried and condemned; but was found one morning dead in the prison. Lewis ordered the papers relating to his trial to be sent to him, in order to stifle the public clamour, which the manner of his brother's death had excited; but though he established a commission for examining the process, nothing was determined, and Lewis loaded the commissioners with favours.

A peace with Burgundy. Before this event happened, the duke of Burgundy had concluded with Lewis the peace of Crotoy, by which St. Quintin, and Amiens were restored to the duke, on condition of his abandoning all his connections with the dukes of Guienne, and Bretagne, while Lewis withdrew his protection from the counts of St. Paul, and Nevers, who were obnoxious to the duke. Lewis refused to ratify this peace; and the duke, in revenge for the death of the duke of Guienne, recommenced hostilities. The whole of the preceding negotiation was a chain of dissimulation, on both sides; but the conduct of Lewis, was, perhaps, more defensible than that of the duke. He had been required by Lewis formally to signify to the dukes of Guienne and Bretagne, lagne, that they had nothing to expect from him; but he privately intimated to the duke of Bretagne, that he had agreed to the treaty of Crotoy, only that he might regain Amiens and St. Quintin, and that he thought himself justified in this management, by the king's having previously broken the treaties of Conflans and Peronne.

Upon the duke of Guienne's death Lewis seized his dutchy, and likewise the county of Armagnac. The duke of Bretagne was intimidated by this into an accommodation with Lewis, who, at the same time, brought over to his service from that of the duke of Burgundy, the famous historian and negotiator, Philip de Commines. The duke of Burgundy, was then attempting to retake the towns on the Somme, in which he was unsuccessful; and he had, to as little purpose, made an irruption into Normandy. However exasperated he and the king were at each other, the road of negotiation was still open, and upon the return of Lewis from Guienne, a truce was concluded. In the interview the king and the duke had on this occasion, the latter, who had formed great projects, discovered to the king the correspondence that had all along been kept up between him and the constable, of whom he complained bitterly, for having ravaged his estates, and it was agreed between them to watch their opportunity for undoing him, as soon as Charles had finished the reduction of Guelders, which he reclaimed under the will of the last duke. But this reunion of Lewis and the duke of Burgundy, was probably owing to the necessity the latter was under of gaining over Lewis, who might otherwise have put an effectual stop to his ambitious views. He had long intrigued with the princes of the empire to be chosen king of the Romans; but in this he was thwarted and disappointed by the management of Lewis. He then applied to the emperor, Frederic III. of Austria, to be made king of Burgundy, and offered to give his daughter in marriage to his son, young Maximilian.

We have already seen how little sincerity there was on all sides in this negotiation, and how it was frustrated by each party finding out the duplicity of the other, most probably, by the artful management of Lewis. After this project misgave, and when Lewis and the duke of Burgundy were contriving to put their schemes in execution against the constable, the latter gained intelligence of what had been concluded between them. He applied to Lewis, with whose disposition he was perfectly well acquainted, and persuaded him that he had received the discovery from the duke of Burgundy himself, in order to fix him in his service. Lewis, however, dissembled, and prolonged the truce for a year, though the latter was at this time accused of having engaged one of the king's cooks to poison him.

self.

It seems to be certain, that the duke of Burgundy's ambition had at this time, involved him in a variety of impracticable projects. He had entered into a fresh negotiation with Edward IV. the first intelligence of which, Lewis had received from Scotland. This negotiation, which was concluded on the twenty fifth of July 1474, had for its object, no less than the conquest of all France by Edward, and the duke of Burgundy; and in the preamble to the treaty, Lewis is termed the usurper, and Edward the lawful heir, of that crown. Lewis was certainly ignorant of this treaty, as the French historians of that time were likewise, and it seems to be first brought to light by Mr. Rymer. Lewis having secured the court of Scotland in his interest, rejected the advice of his ministers, who were for crushing the duke of Burgundy at once, while he was engaged in German wars, which Lewis was so far from doing, that he prolonged the truce with him, that he might involve himself still farther in the affairs of the empire, which he actually did, notwithstanding all the remonstrances of Edward, who called upon him to fulfil the terms of the late treaty. He took part in a dispute concerning the election of an archbishop of Cologne, and besieged one of the competitors, Herman, in Nuys, near that city. Herman made so brave a defence, that Lewis had leisure to lay a scheme for the destruction of the duke, which afterwards proved successful. By the force of money he gained over the princes of Germany, and the cantons of Switzerland, who had great reason to be jealous of the duke, who had purchased the county of Ferrette from duke Sigismund of Austria. He brought the duke of Lorraine into the same confederacy, and the Burgundian was actually besieged in his camp before Nuys, by a German army, while the other confederates were ravaging his estates to the very gates of his capital; but his obstinacy in continuing the siege of Nuys was the crisis of his fate.

Lewis
gains over the En- glish nobility.

The truce between him and Lewis being now expired, the latter having compromised all matters between himself and the king of Arragon, ordered the duke of Bourbon to fall with an army into the duke of Burgundy's estates, and at the same time he attacked the towns on the Somme. Edward's army was on foot, and a noble one it was, ready to invade France; but the duke of Burgundy, though he was to have shared largely in the spoils of Lewis, and had made an honourable retreat from Nuys, madly pursued his revenge upon the duke of Lorraine, and amused Edward with assurances that the constable of France was in his interest. Upon Edward's landing his army in France, he had an interview, with the duke of Burgundy, who assured him that the constable would put Amiens and St. Quintin into his hands, as soon as he should appear before them. But Edward's eyes were soon opened as to the state of his alliance with the duke. Before he commenced hostilities he had sent an herald with a letter, demanding the crown of France from Lewis, who acted with incomparable address on this occasion. He read the letter with an air of gaiety, as if it had been merely complimentary, but taking the herald aside he fairly told him, that his master had been misled by the duke of Burgundy, and the constable, who certainly would deceive him, and that the best thing he could do was to enter into a negotiation and return to England. He seconded his speech with an handsome present, which prevailed with the herald to give him a hint, which afterwards proved of great use to Lewis, that Edward's two chief favourites, the lords Howard, and Stanley, were not inaccessible to money. Lewis then ordered Commines to wait upon the herald, till he took his leave, but that he should converse with none, and Commines openly presented him with a piece of crimson velvet, a management that concealed from the public all knowledge of his real business.

Edward soon found the prediction of Lewis to be true, and makes for though the duke of Burgundy had actually shewn him a treaty promise under the constable's own hand for delivering up with Edward St. Quintin, and Amiens, and assuring him that he and his friends would immediately declare in his favour; yet when a detachment of Edward's army appeared before St. Quintin, it was fired upon, and it lost some men. Edward now saw the futility of all the duke of Burgundy's engagements, and without suffering himself to be farther amused, his ministers sent a private message to Lewis, on the strength of the herald's information, acquainting him how ready they were to serve him. Lewis, who did nothing in the common way, sent an obscure, mean looking, domestic to treat with the lords Stanley, and Howard, which he did so shrewdly, that he was introduced to Edward in person, and after a few previous negotiations, a treaty was concluded, containing the following terms: First, That Lewis should, within fifteen days, pay to Edward seventy five thousand crowns; together with an annuity of fifty thousand crowns a year, payable at Easter and Michaelmas, during the joint lives of the two monarchs. Secondly, That a daughter of Edward should be married to the dauphin, and she have a jointure of sixty thousand livres a year. Thirdly, Edward engaged, upon the payment of the seventy five thousand crowns, to give pledges for evacuating the French dominions; and to enter with Lewis, not only into a truce for seven years, but into a negotiation for a private treaty.

Many separate articles were inserted, but the above are Corrupt the most material of this famous treaty, which reduced the tion of most powerful king of France since the days of Hugh Capet, the French to be tributary to a lewd, licentious prince, a fact which it nation. is in vain for French authors to deny; but perhaps, never was there a people so univervally corrupted as the French nation nation was at this time. It was destitute not only of honesty, but genius. The great men who had served Charles VII. so well, were now extinct, and Lewis supplied their places from his treasury. Frugal and modest in his own person, without cloaths, equipage, or attendance befitting a private gentleman, he amassed money only that he might squander it in the larger quantities for the purposes of corruption; he knew of no cement of friendship, truth, or honour, but gold, and where that could not be properly placed, as sometimes happened, he converted it into the pleasures of the table, magnificent exhibitions, or whatever he knew would best gratify the taste or humours of those he wanted to corrupt. The English court was not more virtuous; but on account of its king's extravagance and unbounded love of pleasure, it was more needy. Both nations had begun to breathe, after long destructive wars, and this, in part, accounts for their degeneracy; but that of England was of a more manly species; for they took the money of Lewis, as he was a tributary to their nation.

The peace of Pi- quigni concluded.

The preliminaries being settled, the two kings had an interview at Pequigni, where the last hand was put to the treaty, and the ransom of queen Margaret, who was a captive to Edward, was fixed at fifty thousand crowns, which Lewis was to pay in five years. The duke of Burgundy hearing of the negotiation posted to the English camp; but all the answer he received from Edward to his reproaches, was, "that it was better to make peace with an enemy, than to rely on a faithless friend." The interview at Piquigni, which was upon a bridge built cross the Seine, and attended with very particular formalities, finished the ruin of the constable, who was equally the aversion of both parties. He had offered Eu, and St. Valery to Edward, with fifty thousand crowns, if he would break off the accommodation, and Edward, at the interview, put all his letters into the hands of Lewis. Nothing could be more for the honour of Edward and the English nation than this peace of Piquigni. The army of Lewis was far superior to that of Edward, who had been betrayed by the duke of Burgundy and the constable, and durst not depend on the duke of Bretagne. The season was far advanced, and Edward, unless he had accepted the constable's offer, did not know where to find winter quarters for his army. He had dictated the terms of the treaty, none of which were objected to by Lewis, who, perhaps, was not a little influenced by the appearance of twenty thousand Englishmen drawn up on the banks of the Somme; add to all this, that Edward was treating with one of the bravest and most successful generals of his age. In short, nothing but the unaccountable humour of Lewis could have made so disgraceful a treaty preferable to an appeal to arms. The duke of Gloucester and the English noblemen, who were disappointed in their expectations

tions from Edward's great army, and who railed most against the treaty, were soon made converts to it by the French gold, which Lewis distributed amongst them; and it is said, upon good authority, that Edward had not a minister in his court to whom Lewis did not grant a pension, only that they might befriend him in all his transactions with Edward; who magnanimously rejected the pressing instances of Lewis, that he would abandon the duke of Bretagne.

The duke of Burgundy parted with Edward in great wrath. The constable of France He swore that he disdained to be included in the truce, and that he would enter into no negotiation with Lewis, till three months after the English had evacuated France; but he thought fit to retract this bravado; for on the thirteenth of September he concluded a truce with Lewis for nine years; and, by a separate article, agreed to give up the constable to Lewis. He would have withdrawn that obligation a few hours after he gave it; but it was too late. The constable was delivered up to Lewis, carried to Paris, tried before the parliament, condemned and publicly executed.

Before the departure of the English army out of France, Lewis gave the soldiers a noble entertainment, upon the streets of Amiens, where tables were spread covered with wine, and the choicest viands, which they partook of in such numbers, as gave some umbrage to Lewis; upon which, Edward ordered his troops to evacuate the town. Upon their leaving his kingdom, and after the execution of the constable, Lewis found himself in a condition to act more arbitrarily than the most powerful of his predecessors had ever done, and he behaved in every respect like a tyrant. The numbers he put to death by the hands of the executioner upon the slightest surmise, are incredible. He invented iron and wooden cages for the confinement of his prisoners, where they lived in perpetual pain, and his racks, tortures and gibbets were seldom unemployed; but an event soon happened which carried him to the summit of greatness.

We have already seen, that the Swiss cantons were among the confederates against the duke of Burgundy, whose possessions now extended from the banks of the Somme almost to the gates of Strasbourg. He secretly aspired to add Lorraine and Switzerland to his dominions; and under pretence of certain Swiss fiefs, interspersed among the estates he had bought from the house of Austria, he had obliged their deputies to address him on their knees, as his vassals. Lewis had bestowed upon him the constable's confiscated estate, and had encouraged him in his wild pursuits of dominion over Lorraine and Switzerland. His insatiable ambition made him ruin Lorraine, where he took Nancy, and drove that duke out of his dominions. He then sought every occasion to quarrel with the Swiss, and many presented, which occasioned several acts of hostilities between the the Swiss and his subjects. After the reduction of Nancy, he found himself under no restraint of openly declaring that he was resolved to subdue Switzerland. The cantons endeavoured to deprecate his wrath, in the most submissive manner, and even offered to renounce their alliance with Lewis. All their advances were rejected by the haughty duke, and under pretence of their having committed some hostilities against his ally the count of Beaumont, and their having assisted the inhabitants of Forette to expel his governor, he entered their country, took several places, and besieged Morat. The Swiss were not wanting to themselves. They beat his troops before Granton, and they made young Rene, duke of Lorraine, their general. They beat him a second time before Morat, and Rene recovered his capital of Nancy; while the dutchess of Savoy, whom the duke of Burgundy had been at great pains to gain over, threw herself under the protection of her brother Lewis.

Charles was, at first, dispirited by so many repeated blows; but resuming his courage, he got together a new army with which he besieged Nancy. Among his general officers was the count of Campobasso, an Italian vagabond, who in revenge of a blow he had received from the duke, meditated his destruction, and kept a secret correspondence with the duke of Lorraine. It is said, that by means of this person, who had a capital command in the army, the siege of Nancy was protracted; and when the duke of Lorraine, with fourteen thousand men, chiefly paid by Lewis's money, advanced to raise the siege, this same Campobasso deserted the duke of Burgundy with the troops under his command, but left behind him some officers, who, like himself, were traitors. It is certain, that a decisive battle was fought on the fifth of January 1477, in which the duke of Burgundy's troops were utterly defeated, and he himself being mortally wounded, was found dead on the ice, next day. Other particulars of this celebrated quarrel and defeat may be seen in the place referred to in the margin.

Lewis re-
annexes Burgundy
to his
crown,

The death of Charles duke of Burgundy surnamed the Rash, one of the most powerful, and certainly the most ambitious of the princes of that age, introduced into Europe a system of power which may be said to last to this day. Lewis had already by his conduct sufficiently demonstrated, that he thought his safety was incompatible with that of the duke. He had punished the king of Sicily for giving a donative of Provence to Charles, who upon that founded his claim to that kingdom. He had refused to assist the king of Portugal, who had come to France on purpose to crave his friendship. He had forced the duke of Bretagne to renounce all his connections with the duke of Burgundy, and he had punished with death, tortures, and confiscation, such of his subjects as he even suspected of being in the Burgundian interest. He waited impatiently for the account of every battle battle fought by Charles, and if it went against him, he was sure to give a pecuniary gratification to the messenger. Being assured of the duke's death, his joy, notwithstanding all his dissimulation, broke out into extravagance; he publicly declared, that he was resolved to unite the late duke's dominions to the crown of France, by marrying the dauphin to his heiress, who was then about eighteen, some say twenty one, years of age. To execute this purpose he raised an army, and marched into Burgundy, which he seized, as he did the towns on the Somme, with the county of Artois, and the city of Bezançon; all which he pretended were male fiefs. In short, he stript the heiress at once of two thirds of her inheritance, and undoubtedly would have seized the remainder, had he not fondly hoped to annex it to his crown by the marriage, though the proposed bridegroom was then no more than seven years of age.

It was now that Lewis felt the operation of the gold he and di- had distributed among the English nobility. Even Edward's vides the own sister, the dutchess dowager of Burgundy, could not pre- Flemings.

vail with him to interpose in favour of the princess. Lewis had brought over her chancellor with the rest of her Flemish ministers to his interest. They abhorred the French alliance, and put to death, even in the presence of the young princess, who in vain interceded for their lives, such of her counsellors as favoured it. Maximilian, son to the emperor of Germany, was their favourite choice, and the states of Flanders pretended that their sovereign ought to be directed by them in so an important an affair as the disposal of her body in marriage. It appears, however, that the young dutchess had given Lewis very favourable intimations of her inclination to marry the dauphin; and that he sent her letters to the Flemings, who were so enraged at reading them, that they put her under confinement, and raised an army to protect her against Lewis. Many were the rivals who pretended to marry her. The queen of England contested strongly, that her brother, the earl of Rivers, should be the happy man. Adolphus, duke of Guelders, who had a fair prospect of success, was killed in a battle by the French. The count of Angoulesme, one of the first princes of Lewis's blood, was, likewise, a candidate for her hand, but his pretensions were discouraged by Lewis; and unsurmountable objections starting up against each, the princess, by the advice of her-mother-in-law, sister to Edward, declared for Maximilian, whom she accordingly married, with the approbation of the states of Flanders, who put him at the head of an army. It was generally thought, that Lewis would have resented the conclusion of this match; but he seemingly approved of it, seeing that there was no possibility of bringing the Flemings to consent to the marriage of his son, with the young dutchess, and dreading the consequences of her matching with the count of Angloulesme.

Death of
the count
of Armag-
nac.

Lewis, though he disguised his resentment, found his situation such, that he was obliged to give up Quesnoy and Bouchain to Maximilian, and, by the help of his pensioners at the court of England, he obtained a prolongation of the truce between the two nations. This gave Lewis an opportunity to attend to the internal state of his kingdom. The count of Armagnac, now duke of Nemours, whom he had so generously freed from his imprisonment, in the beginning of his reign, had on several occasions joined, or seemed to join, with the enemies of Lewis, who vowed his destruction with unparalleled barbarity. He was seized at Carlat, in 1477, carried to the bastile, where he was imprisoned in an iron cage, suffered the torture, and condemned to death. His execution was accompanied by an extraordinary strain of barbarity; for Lewis ordered his children to be confined under the boards of the scaffold, where their father suffered, that they might be sprinkled, as they were, with their father's blood. The duke's estates were distributed among the royal favourites, the chief of whom was one Oliver le Dain, his barber, who got an entire ascendancy over his master, by threatening to poison him, or to cut his throat, if he lost his favour. But those were only personal cruelties, for Lewis introduced one that was political, which extended beyond the lives of the original delinquents. He emitted an edict, by which all persons who had knowledge of any treasonable practices, were to be treated as principals, if they did not reveal them.

Maximilian had parts and courage, and resolved, if possible, to regain part of his wife's hereditary dominions, which had been seized by Lewis. In this he was supported by the states of Flanders; but Lewis gave the command of an army to Chaumont, who retook the city of Besançon. Both parties found it their interest to conclude a truce, and the reader in other parts of this history, will find a detail of the numerous engagements and negotiations in which Lewis was now involved.

discovers and defeats the intrigues
of his enemies.

It is certain, that he was haunted with the most despicable weaknesses that can attend human nature, while he was exerting the most amazing acts of true, as well as false, policy. He detached don Ferdinand and donna Isabella, king and queen of Arragon and Castile, from their connections with the emperor of Germany, and his son; and he plied the court of England so effectually with his gold, that neither the dutchess dowager of Burgundy, nor the duke of Bretagne, could awaken Edward to a just sense of his interests. So far from that, he connected himself more closely with Lewis than ever, though Lewis had discovered that Edward and the duke of Bretagne were pursuing measures entirely destructive to his crown. Though the correspondence between them was carried on with what they thought to be impenetrable secrecy; yet so forcible was the corruption employed by Lewis, that he transcribed the originals of their most private correspondence, and communicated communicated the copies to both parties; but Lewis was so moderate, that he made no other use of this discovery than to make the principals sensible of their danger, and that he was acquainted with their practices. Each thought that he was betrayed by the other; but Lewis made advantage of both, and disposed of his money so well at the court of England, that he prevailed with Edward to prolong the truce between the two nations, on pretence that the dauphin was yet too young to consummate his marriage; which had been agreed upon between the parents, with Edward's daughter, the princess Elizabeth, who was, afterwards, the wife of Henry VII. of England. At the same time, he entered with Edward into a most seemingly cordial a new treaty, for each engaged to assist the other against his rebellious subjects; to give one another shelter in their respective dominions, and to make no alliance without the joint approbation of both. Lewis, about the same time, proposed to join an army with one from England to conquer Flanders, which he was to give up to Edward, together with Brabant, as soon as it should be conquered; but the people of England were so much attached to the house of Burgundy, that they would not suffer him to prosecute such a war.

Lewis continued to pay Edward's appointments with the utmost punctuality; but Edward perceived he was shuffling with him with regard to the marriage between the dauphin and his daughter, and therefore concluded a treaty with the archduke Maximilian, and his wife the dutchess of Burgundy, who promised to continue to him the annual subsidy of fifty thousand crowns, if Lewis should withdraw it, while Edward sent to their assistance six thousand archers, and obtained a promise that their son, the count of Charolois, who was yet in his cradle, should marry his daughter Anne. Edward vindicated his conduct in concluding this treaty, by taxing Lewis with the breach of his agreement with him, and of having spirited up the Scots to invade England.

Maximilian had now renewed hostilities against Lewis, and besieged Terouenne, which d'Esquerdes, the French governor of Picardy, attempting to relieve, a battle ensued at Guingate. The French, who were strongest in horse, had, at first, the advantage of the field, but it was soon recovered by Maximilian, at the head of the Flemish infantry. He was disabled, however, from pursuing the siege; but he hanged the commandant, and put to the sword the garrison of a castle he afterwards took; for which Lewis ordered fifty prisoners taken at the battle of Guingate, among whom, was a son of the king of Poland, who served as a volunteer in the Flemish army, to be hanged; but a reprieve came to the Polish prince, while the halter was about his neck.

The great trade which the Flemings then carried on rendered their ships very profitable prizes to the Norman privateers, the chief of whom was one Coulon, who, this year, took fourscore sail of them. This blow dispirited the Flemings from carrying on the war with vigour, and before the end of the year they concluded a truce. In 1480, died Charles de Maine, count of Provence, the last of the house of Anjou; and Lewis inherited his estates. As the Franc archers, or militia, raised and paid by the villages, had misbehaved in the battle of Guingate, Lewis broke them, and substituted in their place ten thousand Swiss, who were then reckoned equal to any troops in Europe, to whom he added ten thousand of his own regulars. That same year, the cardinal de la Rovere came to France from the pope, to offer his mediation between Lewis and Maximilian; but though he failed in his errand, he procured the liberty of cardinal Balue, who had leave to retire to Rome.

The excessive application of Lewis to business began to affect his health, and he was attacked by a stroke of a palsy, from which he recovered; but it was far from relaxing the intenseness of his application. Having, as we have already seen, new modelled his army, he was indefatigable in introducing into it a new discipline, and he ordered a strong camp to be marked out in Normandy, where he assisted in person at all the reviews and exercises of his soldiers. He put the affairs of his nephew, duke Philibert of Savoy, on an excellent footing; but that prince dying in the spring of the year 1481, as he was paying a visit to his uncle, Lewis declared himself guardian to his brother and successor Charles. Two events which happened soon after carried the good fortune of Lewis to its summit.

Edward of England, and the duke of Bretagne, this year dies of a fit of the apoplexy. concluded a treaty, which was aimed against Lewis; but before any thing could be done in consequence of this treaty, Edward was carried off by a fit of an apoplexy; and the dutchess of Burgundy was killed by a fall from her horse. By those two deaths England fell into distractions, and the house of Burgundy lost its support; for the Flemings quarrelled with Maximilian about the custody of his young son.

ibid. The health of Lewis was finally ruined about the time he became thus prosperous. Though he protected the crown of Navarre, and kept possession of Roussillon and Cerdagne, yet he lived in good correspondence with Ferdinand and Isabella, the joint monarchs of Spain. He was in alliance with the Portuguese; he had nothing to fear from Italy, which was torn to pieces within itself; the Swiss behaved towards him as if they had been his natural born subjects; the emperor, Frederic, was at war with his own relations, and unable to support his son, Maximilian. At home, notwithstanding his bloody executions, and the heavy taxes he raised, his people in general found themselves more at ease than they had been under the tyranny of their great lords, and he had raised his revenue from seventeen hundred thousand livres a year, to four millions and an half, exclusive five of the revenues arising from the royal domains. He had added to the kingdom left him by his father, Burgundy, the Franche Comte, Artois, the territory of Boulogne, the cities on the Somme, Provence, and Anjou, and, to complete his happiness, he had in a manner annihilated the dangerous powers of the princes of his blood, and his other great lords; but he was now unable to relish his happiness. He had been attacked at Tours with another fit of the apoplexy, and he had contracted a gloomy habit of thinking and living. He shut himself up in the castle of Plessis, which he ordered to be moated round, and his windows darkened and ironed, like those of a prison. His spirit was so much affected, that the domestics about his person, whom he had raised out of the dust, obtained of him what they pleased, by threatening to put an end to his life; and what is pretty extraordinary, the more sensibly he perceived the approaches of death, he was at the greater pains to conceal them from the world. If at any time he appeared in public, he affected an unusual gaiety of dress, and admitted of diversions, to which he was so little used, that they were of the most ridiculous and extravagant kind.

Lewis, with every quality that was at once contemptible and cruel, was superstitious to a degree almost incredible, and therefore he imagined himself to be religious. He was always covered over with relics, and when he was about to commit a murder, he used to ask pardon of a leaden image of the Virgin Mary, which he wore in his hat; and he made a present of the county of Boulogne to the same virgin. All his arts, however, could not prevent the horrors of death from preying upon his soul. While he continued shut up at Plessis, it was surrounded by numerous guards, that none might have access to his person without a special permission. He gave immense prices for fresh relics, which he purchased from all quarters; and hearing of a Calabrian hermit, one Francisco Martorillo, celebrated for his piety, he sent for him, threw himself at his feet, and begged him to prolong his life by his prayers. By the pope's permission he wore the surplice and the aumess, which is the ornament of a canon when he celebrates mass; and he enacted that, at twelve o'clock at noon, upon the toll of a bell, all his subjects should say an Ave Maria. A few weeks before his death he sent for his son, who had been educated at Amboise, under the lord Beaujeu, to whom he had given his daughter Anne in marriage, and gave him his last advice, which was so excellent that it would have done honour to the memory of the best and wisest of princes; but above all, he enjoined him not to follow his example, but to live in peace with his neighbours, and be a father to his people.

Being visited with the third stroke of the apoplexy, as Death, soon as he recovered his senses, he ordered his seal to be carried to his son, whom he directed to be treated from that time as king, and he died on the thirtieth of August 1483, not without expressing some remorse for the wickedness and cruelty of his life, in the twenty-third year of his reign, and the sixty-first of his age.

and character of Lewis.

We shall now proceed to the bright part of the character of Lewis, who possessed many great and noble qualities. He suffered no man in his kingdom, but himself, to be unjust, and was strict in the administration of his civil and criminal courts. When Paris was depopulated by pestilence, he replenished it with inhabitants, and though many of them were outlaws and robbers, yet so excellent was the police he had introduced, that they became good and orderly subjects. We have already observed, that he was brave in his person, and an able, fortunate general, when he chose to act at the head of an army. He was liberal even to a fault, and, for the conveniency of his subjects, he established two hundred and thirty carriers, who travelled through his kingdom in the nature of posts, and let out their horses to his subjects, at the rate of ten sols for thirty leagues. He established one standard for weights and measures throughout his kingdom, and was the author of many other useful institutions, which proved how well he had studied the arts of government.

He proved but an indifferent husband to his first wife, Margaret of Scotland, though a most amiable princess. She was famous for regarding learned men, and for having killed Alain Chartier, the best scholar, but the ugliest man about the court, while he was asleep. Perhaps, this freedom of behaviour disgusted her husband, for she died of heart-break. The second wife of Lewis was Charlotte of Savoy, by whom he had a son, Joachim, who died young, as did his second, Francis, duke of Berry. His daughters were Anne, whom he married to the lord of Beaujeu, younger brother to the duke of Bourbon, and Joan, married to the duke of Orleans, but was divorced from him after he became king. Lewis, notwithstanding his religious freaks, had several mistresses, and natural children; but he proved an inhuman husband to Charlotte of Savoy, whom, when he was upon his death-bed, he condemned to exile at Amboise, where she died that same year, in the thirty eighth year of her age.

Charles VIII.

Charles neglected in his education.

THIS prince lay under many disadvantages both of body and mind. In his person he was deformed, but he had a lively eye. His parts, though of themselves they were but moderate, remained wholly unimproved by education, through the jealousy of his father, who strictly enjoined his governor, the lord of Beaujeu, to keep him ignorant ignorant of every accomplishment that became his rank. Lewis, in his life time, had given his daughter Anne, the appellation of dame, or lady of Beaujeu, and well knowing the disadvantages under which his son, who had now attained the age of fourteen, which was that of his majority, lay, he had wisely recommended her to be assistant to his son in his government, but without naming her husband, to prevent all contest for superiority between him and the other princes of the blood. His providence was ineffectual; for though the lord of Beaujeu was well qualified to be her brother's coadjutor, (she could not be regent because he was of age) yet her authority was disputed by the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon. The former was an amiable young prince of twenty three years of age, and the other about sixty; but universally respected for his wisdom and moderation. The duke of Orleans was first prince of the blood. He presented a memorial to the parliament of Paris, praying that the administration should be altered. That body was in the dame of Beaujeu's interest, and very properly answered the duke, by la Vaquerie, their first president, that they were no other than a court of law, and had no power in the affairs of government, which belonged to the assembly of the states.

While this affair was in agitation, all parties, to render themselves popular, agreed in punishing the infamous tools ministers of government in the late reign. The chief of those were punished. Oliver le Daim, count of Meulun, whom Lewis had raised from being his barber, to be his bosom favourite and first minister; but he was now hanged, upon an accusation of adultery and murder. John Doiac, another instrument of oppression under Lewis, after being twice whipped, lost both his ears; but Cottier, the physician of Lewis, who had amassed a vast fortune, and did what he pleased by threatening to poison his master, if he punished him, purchased his peace with his money.

After the re-annexation of Burgundy to the crown, the duke of Bretagne was considered as the first vassal of France. He had generally protected the earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII. of England; but the duke, though otherwise an excellent prince, had for some time been governed by Landais, who, like Daim, had risen from the profession of a common barber, to be his first minister. His morals were as worthless as his birth was mean, and he was hated by the Breton nobility; but though the prince of Orange, and marshal Rieux, had sought to displace him, his master's partiality in his favour disappointed them, and forced them to leave Bretagne. Landais applied for protection to the dame of Beaujeu, but without effect, for she protected all the Bretons who were his enemies. Landais, at first, befriended the earl of Richmond, and persuaded his master to lend him five thousand men for a descent upon England;

but his fleet being forced back by stress of weather, Landais engaged to deliver him up to Richard, tho' without his master's privity; but this agreement was discovered, and the earl escaped out of Bretagne, and was received at Langy with great politeness and affection by the French court, who promised to assist him with troops upon his swearing to marry the princess Elizabeth, eldest daughter to Edward IV. Landais, on his application, being rejected by the dame of Beaujeu, invited the duke of Orleans to repair to Bretagne. That duke's principal friend, at this time, was the count of Longueville, whose father Dunois, had so gloriously served Charles VII. He advised the duke to court the duke of Bretagne's daughter and heiress; but the count, when he saw her, fell in love with her himself.

Intrigues
of the duke of Orleans,

The dame of Beaujeu was perfectly sensible of the duke of Orleans views when he visited Bretagne, and he was forced, against his inclination, to repair to the assembly of the states at Tours. Before their meeting, she had brought over to her interest her brother-in-law, the duke of Bourbon, by promising him the constable's sword; so that the Orleans party in the assembly were the minority, and the assembly confirmed her authority, and appointed a council to assist her. Before the states separated they made the king a present of three hundred thousand livres to defray the expence of his coronation, besides two millions and an half for his ordinary occasions. The vesting the government in a manner wholly in the dame of Beaujeu, was far from being agreeable to the princes and nobility of France, and even the duke of Bourbon, thinking he had been outwitted, joined the Orleans party; as did Rene, the duke of Alençon.

to whom
inclines

The dame of Beaujeu knowing that their chief dependence was upon the duke of Bretagne, hazarded, on this occasion, a notable stroke of policy. She sent a person of a steady address, whom she could trust, in the name of the duke of Orleans, to desire the duke of Bretagne not to send any troops into France till he should call for them; by which the duke was, for that time, disappointed of his auxiliaries, on whom he depended. But notwithstanding this, the dame of Beaujeu was in a most undesirable situation, for the king himself inclined to the Orleans party, and there was no man of great consequence in France, excepting her own husband, whom she could depend on. She was obliged to pacify Rene, duke of Lorraine, who claimed all the Anjouvine estates, by giving him a pension, and the dutchy of Bar, and promising that his title should be examined. The dame of Beaujeu, by this management, brought over to her party, a firm friend. When the duke of Orleans, after his being disappointed from Bretagne, came to court, he found the king surrounded by the dame's creatures, and that it was impossible to render himself master of the king's person. He addressed himself to the parliament; but they refused to concern themselves in the dispute; and he failed in the execution of a design he had formed upon Orleans. Being thus disappointed on all hands, he was forced to compromise matters with the dame of Beaujeu; who insisted upon his parting with his faithful friend the count of Longueville; and that count generously advised him to consent to the separation.

The revolution which happened, at this time, in England, Revolution in had a great influence upon the affairs of France. The earl of Richmond, after being generously entertained at that court, England. obtained the command of two thousand, some say four thousand, of the best troops of France; who had been greatly instrumental towards his mounting the throne of England. He had likewise borrowed a large sum of money from that court; and had left the marquis of Dorset, and Sir John Bourchier, his hostages for repaying it. Having then no enemy to fear in England, the dame of Beaujeu, who, in imitation of her father, had fomented the disorders in the Low Countries, seemed secure in her government, though she was well apprized of her secret danger.

By this time, the Breton noblemen had put to death Peter Landais, and the affairs of that dutchy were in the hands of the prince of Orange and count Lescun, who appeared to be attached to the court of France. The prince of Orange, however, kept up a private correspondence with the duke of Orleans; whose variance with the dame of Beaujeu now proceeded to such a height, that he gave her the lie at the council-table; which was resented by a blow on the face by the duke of Lorraine. The duke of Orleans, encouraged by the prince of Orange, escaped from the French court to Bretagne, where a strong confederacy was formed against the dame's administration.

The chief parties were, the dukes of Bretagne and Orleans, and Maximilian, now king of the Romans. They guaranteed the succession of Bretagne to that duke's daughters; against the and their prospect of success was such, that the dukes of French Lorraine and Bourbon, with the count of Angoulême, entered monarchy into the confederacy. The dame of Beaujeu was not wanting to herself. As the strength of the confederacy lay in Bretagne, and the property of its members in other parts of France, the young king, who, with the appearance of a changling, had a martial disposition, put himself at the head of an army; and, being again joined by Rene, duke of Lorraine, he fell upon their estates in Anjou and Guienne; which he ravaged so unmercifully, that several of the allies dropped off from the confederacy; and, in particular, the duke of Bourbon with the count of Angoulême. Some motions of Maximilian, king of the Romans, on the side of Flanders, prevented Charles carrying his arms all at once into Bretagne; but his army remained so long upon its frontiers, that the Breton

Breton nobility made a secret treaty with France; by which the Orleans party was weakened, as that duke was to have left Britany by the terms of the agreement.

whom the duke of Bourbon
joins,

The acquisition of the duke of Bourbon proved to be of great importance to the dame of Beaujeu; for he discovered, to her, two lords about the king's person, Cubant and the famous Philip de Commynes, who held a correspondence with the duke of Orleans, who were condemned to spend eight months in one of the iron cages constructed in the late reign.

as d'Albret
confederates.

The dame of Beaujeu's, or what we may call the court, party, was now possessed of vast advantages; and the duke of Orleans, finding his party to be too weak among the Bretons, and that Maximilian, whose private agent was the prince of Orange, was of little service to his cause, applied to the lord d'Albret, one of the confederates, and a very powerful prince. His dominions, however, where his troops lay, were far separated from Bretagne; and the intermediate provinces were held by the king: but he was tempted by the hopes of marrying the heiress of Bretagne, though the duke of Orleans secretly intended her for himself, in expectation of getting a divorce from his own wife; and the prince of Orange expected she would fall to the share of the king of the Romans. D'Albret swallowed the bait; and, the treaty between Charles and the Breton lords being now ineffectual, he entered that province with three great armies.

Duke Francis II. was then old; but he was beloved by his subjects, and at the head of eighteen thousand men. An artful Breton, one Maurice de Menez, gave out, that the quarrel between the king and the duke of Orleans was only a feint to reduce Bretagne, and get the person of their duke into the power of Charles: upon which, great part of his army left him; and Ploermell, Vannes, and Dinant, were reduced by Charles, who then formed the siege of Nantes.

The siege
raised.

Both parties, on this occasion, applied to Henry VII. of England, who had formerly lain under the highest obligations to each; but that artful prince eluded the application, and seemed rather to blame the ambition of the duke of Orleans, than disposed to enter into his quarrel. The duke of Bretagne was now obliged to raise the militia of the Lower Bretagne; consisting, as it is said, of sixty thousand men; and he and his generals behaved with such courage and conduct, that they obliged the French army to raise the siege of Nantes: and the arts that had been made use of to divide the duke and his subjects being now fully exposed, they were reconciled anew.

Views of Charles
upon Bre- tagne,

The truth is, the public began now, to more than, suspect, that Charles, though contracted to the dutchess of Burgundy, who was then actually at his court, intended to marry the princess of Bretagne; and thereby to reannex that noble dutchy to his crown. The consideration of this awakened Henry from his neutrality, and he winked at some of his subjects subjects serving as volunteers in Bretagne, to the great disgust of the French. His parliament, almost to a man, was against the re-annexation; and voted a subsidy for supporting the duke of Bretagne. But it was then too late. Charles, before he put into winter-quarters, had, by his excellent general, La Trimouille, taken Cliffon, Guerche, d'Ancennis, Chateau Briant, Vitre, and many other places, which the successes of the marshal de Rieux, the Breton general, in the winter, could not compensate for. Charles was equally successful at Guienne, where the lord d'Albret found himself under the necessity of submitting; and, early in the spring, Charles once more entered Bretagne with a noble army, commanded, under himself, by Trimouille; after his other troops had beaten those of Maximilian and taken the town of St. Omer.

The re-union of the Breton lords, who now clearly saw which he the danger of their country's losing its independency, gave fresh spirit to the duke of Orleans and his party; but they still affected great moderation, by treating with the dame of Beaujeu; who amused them, in her turn, till, in the spring, they found the French army in the heart of their country. By this time, the lord d'Albret had resumed his arms; and had, by sea, joined the Bretons with four thousand men; besides, his troops, who, being in the king's service, had revolted on this occasion.

A war, thus subject to so many vicissitudes, and assuming so many different complexions, required the greatest address and firmness to manage it; and the dame of Beaujeu discovered both. The parliament of Paris, and the assembly of the states, still continued to be in her interest; and the duke of Orleans, with the counts of Longueville and Comminges, with other noblemen, received summonses to appear before the parliament, and to answer for their conduct. The voice of authority is so powerful, that they were afraid of being treated as rebels; and they thought that they had now no other safety but the success of their arms.

The French army besieged Fougeres, the strongest frontier town belonging to Bretagne, and garrisoned by two thousand men. It held out only for eight days, which was a great disappointment to the duke of Orleans and the Breton lords; and the loss of St. Aubin de Cormier immediately after, determined them to venture a general engagement; which accordingly happened, on the twenty-eighth of July, at St. Aubin. The first line of the Bretons was commanded by the lord d'Albret and the marshal Rieux. In the second line, the English lord, Woodville, or, as some call him, the lord Scales, commanded a body of four hundred English volunteers; and, so great was the dread of the English arms, at that time, that the Breton generals ordered sixteen hundred of their own men to wear red crosses; which were the badges of the English, in hopes that it would intimidate their enemies. The prince prince of Orange commanded the Breton infantry, and the duke of Orleans the German auxiliaries sent him by Maximilian. As to the army of Charles, it was chiefly composed of horse, the whole commanded by Trimouille, and both armies were pretty equal in their numbers, each amounting to about twelve thousand. Many of the Breton horse disliked the service they were engaged in, and they left their foot, who behaved better, to be cut in pieces, so that Trimouille's victory was complete. As Henry, from his natural caution, had formally disowned the conduct of Woodville, we are not to be surprized that neither he nor the English under him received any quarter; nor did any of the Bretons who fought under the English badges; so that about five thousand five men hundred lay dead upon the field.

The duke
of Orleans
and the prince of Orange
prisoners.

The duke of Orleans and the prince of Orange were taken prisoners, and carried to St. Aubin, where Trimouille entertained them in his apartment; but after supper two cordeliers came in to prepare them, as they said, for immediate death, by Trimouille's orders. He relieved them, however, by acquainting them, that he would suspend their fate till he should receive orders from his court; but he told them at the same time, that he had, by his own authority, ordered the heads of some of the Bretagne noblemen, who had been taken in arms, to be struck off, as rebels. The battle of St. Aubin proved fatal to the confederate princes. The duke of Orleans continued three years a prisoner in the castle of Bourges. The king of the Romans was so far from being able to assist the old duke of Bretagne, that he himself had been made a prisoner by the Ghentois, and the dame of Beaujeu, who by the death of her husband's elder brother, was now dutchess of Bourbon, omitted nothing that could improve the victory. She pretended to repose great confidence in Henry, that her views were extremely moderate, and that her brother had only attacked the duke of Bretagne in order to disable the malecontent princes during the absence of Charles in an expedition, which he was meditating for making good his family claim upon the crown of Naples.

An ac-
dation.

All this while, however, the old duke was losing St. Malo, and so many other places, that he at last shut himself up in Nantes; from whence he sent the count of Longueville to obtain the best terms he could from Charles. Though that nobleman was excessively obnoxious to the French court, yet he was favourably received, and commissioners were appointed on both sides for a treaty. The Bretons, before they would enter upon the negotiation, insisted upon those of France giving them some categorical satisfaction with regard to the succession of their dutchy, in their master's daughters; and the others made so many difficulties on that head, that the conferences were on the point of breaking off; but the difference was at last compromised, by the duke duke of Bretagne and his states agreeing that he should marry neither of his daughters without the consent of Charles. A treaty was then concluded on the twenty-eighth of August 1488, which restored the peace of Bretagne; but, ten days after, the duke of Bretagne died, of the hurts he received by a fall from his horse; and soon after died the youngest princess of Bretagne, so that the eldest was now the sole possessor of that dutchy.

Death of
the duke
Bretagne.

Her father, on his death-bed, had left her an excellent council, and had desired her to be chiefly guided by the advice of the count of Longueville, and next to him, by the marshal de Rieux, and the count of Comminges. The marriage of the young dutchess was most singularly perplexed. The late duke had been so far engaged with Maximilian, that he had married her by his proxy the prince of Orange, who in the name of his principal, had put one of his legs into bed with the princess. After that, the old duke seeing the perplexity of Maximilian's affairs, had promised her to the lord d'Albert, who was forty five years of age, disagreeable in his person, and already the father of seven legitimate children; therefore we cannot suppose he was agreeable to the young lady, who was no more than thirteen years of age. Charles had marked her out for himself; but Henry VII. upon whom all her hopes now rested, had never entertained an idea that such a marriage could take place, as Margaret of Burgundy was still at the French court, with her father, Maximilian's consent, and was in every respect, but that of age, considered as the wife of Charles.

Perplexi-
ties of his heirefs,

The reader is here to observe, that Charles in his right as sovereign, had a strong claim upon the dutchy of Bretagne. The heirs of the house of Penthievre had ceded to his crown all their rights, which, by the extinction of the male line of the Mountfort race, were become now at least very plausible; a process for treason against the late duke was still depending in parliament, nor was Charles debarred from re-examining whether the fief of Bretagne could descend to females.

who is assisted by England.

Such were the considerations, and not the apprehensions of a marriage between Charles and the young dutchess, that determined the king and people of England to interest themselves seriously in her favour. Henry sought, according to his genius, to do it by ballancing parties upon the continent, and by setting numerous negotiations on foot; but to give them weight, he not only connived at his subjects serving in the armies of the dutchess, but raised a noble army for her defence, the command of which he gave to the lord Brook, and Sir John Hawkwell. He then concluded with her a treaty offensive and defensive at Rhedon; by which he was to send over immediately to her assistance six thousand men, but she was to pledge two of her towns, and

and give hostages for repaying his expences, and to engage not to marry but by his consent. After the conclusion of this treaty, which on the part of Henry was mean and mercenary, he concluded a treaty with the court of Spain, and Maximilian, to whom he sent succours for suppressing a fresh insurrection of the Flemings against him. He then threw off the mask he had hitherto worn towards France, and not only sent over the six thousand English auxiliaries to Bretagne, but told the archbishop of Sens, the French ambassador at his court, that he would employ all the force of England to prevent any reunion of that dutchy to the crown of France,

Upon the landing of the auxiliaries some hostilities past between them and the French. The dutchess herself was then in the hands of her chancellor, who had declared for none of her suitors. The marshal de Rieux continued to favour D'Albret, and kept possession of Nantes, but was opposed by the German and the Orleans party.

Artful

conduct of Charles.

It was now high time for Charles to strike the blow he had meditated so long. He quieted all suspicions in the breast of Maximilian, to whom he offered to refer all his concerns in Bretagne; and brought John de Chalons, prince of Orange, over wholly to his interest, by generously setting him at liberty and sending him back to Bretagne; where he had a great interest, and ballanced those of D'Albret and the chancellor. The latter had prevailed with the dutchess to prefer her engagements with Maximilian to all other; and looking upon him as her husband, she had suffered acts of government to pass in their joint names, in which she was encouraged by Henry VII.

This coming to the ears of Charles, he proposed setting the duke of Orleans, who, by this time, had dropped all pretensions to the dutchess, at liberty; and employing him, and the count of Longueville, as his agents at the Breton court. The dutchess of Bourbon, though she was said to have an affection for the duke of Orleans, and though the marriage had been originally planned by herself, opposed his being set at liberty; but Charles, by the advice of his favourite, Meolan, paid the duke a visit, and delivered him from his confinement with such an air of frankness and affection, as gained him entirely over to his service in the affair of the marriage. But it is now necessary that we should take a view of the conduct of the French ministry.

Terms of the treaty of Frank- fort.

A treaty was still depending at Frankfort between Maximilian and Charles. The latter agreed to compromise the differences concerning the earldom of Charolois and the dutchy of Burgundy, which Maximilian still continued to claim in right of his marriage; and that he should employ his best offices in Maximilian's favour with the discontented Flemings. Charles, at the same time, dissembled so well, that that he agreed to the dutchess of Bretagne enjoying all the estates her father died possessed of; provided the English should immediately evacuate Bretagne; and that those places there which were in the hands of the French should be sequestered into the hands of the duke of Bourbon and the prince of Orange. Charles, the better to disguise his real intentions from Maximilian, had, during the dependence of this treaty, given him the title of father; and the whole of the negotiation lulled the Bretons into security.

Henry VII. alone saw through the duplicity of the French court; and not only put the dutchess of Bretagne on her guard, but sent her fresh reinforcements; and represented to her, that she had gained, in reality, nothing by the treaty of Frankfort; as the execution of the most important interests was referred to future discussions, not to mention that it was absolutely inconsistent with the treaty of Rhedon. The secret attachment of the dutchess to Maximilian, rendered all Henry's representations ineffectual; and she not only made dispositions for carrying the treaty of Frankfort into execution, but dismissed her English auxiliaries. Even this compliance did not satisfy Charles; for, pretending that the English ought to evacuate the cautionary towns they held in Bretagne, he prepared to renew the war in that dutchy.

The dutchess now found herself in a worse state than ever. Difficulties of the She again flew for relief to Henry. He refused to do any thing but negotiate; but, at last, he concluded a treaty with Maximilian for recovering, out of the hands of Charles, of Bretagne, all the places formerly belonging to the dutchies of Burgundy, or Bretagne. The emperor and the crown of Spain acceded to this treaty; and it might have operated powerfully against France, if Henry could have been persuaded to part with his money. Charles knew his weak side, and sent a magnificent embassy to London, with Francis of Luxembourg at its head; the famous Robert de Gaguin being appointed speaker for the ambassadors: and, if the speech put in his mouth by lord Bacon was actually delivered by him, Charles could not have made a better choice.

Henry, at first, was very high in his demands, which amounted to a restitution of all the antient patrimony of the English kings in France. This being peremptorily refused by the ambassadors, Henry was afraid he had gone too far; and, by way of apology, he nominated a fresh embassy to the court of France.

Charles, in the mean time, made such dispositions as entirely pent the dutchess of Bretagne into a very small district of her dominions; and her contract, or rather marriage, with Maximilian, being now public, d'Albret, and the marquis de Rieux, chose that Charles should be her husband rather than Maximilian; and, notwithstanding all opposition made by Henry VII. they delivered up the city of Nantes to Charles, who now began to unfold his real intentions of annexannexing Bretagne to his crown either by arms or marriage. He assembled a large army, and actually blocked the dutchess up in Rennes.

who takes The outwitting so great a politician as Henry VII. of Eng-the title of land was, seems to have been owing to the dutchess of Bour- queen of bon; but the favourite of Charles persuaded him to cast him-the Ro- self entirely upon the affections of his subjects; and that mans. the plan of the dutchess was to rule by a party. The Eng- lish ambassadors were in France, and the dutchess applied to them for that protection which their master ought to have given her before. She had, for some time, assumed the title of queen of the Romans; but the French had so artfully embarrassed Maximilian with his Flemish and other subjects, that she derived no support from her husband. Under all these discouragements, she behaved with undaunted courage, till the duke of Orleans and the count of Longueville took the part of Charles, exposed her defenceless condition, the disproportion of age between her and Maximilian, his needy circumstances, being a king only in name, and all the horrors that must attend her and her country, if Charles should acquire Bretagne by the way of arms.

To give force to their arguments, Charles was now actually besieging Rennes; and the dutchess, at last, after some apparent reluctance, consented, that her marriage with Charles should be examined by her council. The truth is, she began now to have a mean opinion of Maximilian's person as well as power; and she was easily convinced, that there could be no validity in the empty forms of a marriage that he had never consummated; which was precisely the case with Charles and Maximilian's daughter. In short, all her council had been gained by French gold, hostilities ceased, and the marriage between her and Charles was consummated.

but is The reader can easily figure to himself the astonishment married to into which this match, said to have been proposed to the Charles. bride, and concluded, in one day, threw all Europe. It is a circumstance hardly paralleled in history, that a young prince, scarcely twenty, under so many disadvantages, both of person and education, should deprive his father-in-law, for so Maximilian had been long considered by the public, of his bride; but it was in vain for Maximilian to rave, for he could do little more. The resentment of Henry was more dangerous. He had been imposed upon by madam Laval, sister to d'Albret, and the marshal de Rieux, who was, at that time, at his court, and was secretly in the interests of Charles.
He assembled his parliament, and, in a formal speech, he endeavoured to persuade them of what he did not himself believe; that the French were a ruined and divided people; that it was easy for him to form a confederacy with the other princes of Europe, which would reinstate him in all that the kings of England formerly held in France. In short,
he

he told them that he was resolved to lead an army in person against Charles.

The king of Spain was, at that time, actually treating Henry VII. with Charles about the recovery of Roussillon and Cerdagne. Henry, however, had gone too far with his parliament not to appear to do somewhat answerable to his engagements. He fitted out a fleet for the assistance of Maximilian, whom he found to be so poor that he could not contribute a penny toward his own relief. This cooled Henry's ardour, and he began afresh to negotiate with the French court; but, at the same time, he went over with a noble army to Calais, tho' too late in the year for fighting; it being the sixth of October before he landed there. Though he carried over with him thirty thousand well appointed troops, and though he took Ardres and besieged Boulogne, yet Charles, who lay with his army at Tours, seemed not to be alarmed; and it soon appeared, that, on the side of Henry, he only wanted to save appearances with his subjects; to whom he rendered the siege of Boulogne, at so advanced a season, very expensive and fatiguing.

It was not long before Desguardes, who had lately been made a marshal of France, appeared at Henry's head-quarters, and produced full powers from Charles for accommodating all differences between the two crowns; and, in a few days, the preliminaries of the famous treaty of Estaples were settled. The contents were, That Henry should be paid an hundred and fifty thousand pounds for his expences, and that the allies of both crowns should have four months time to be included in the treaty.

This dishonourable negotiation being concluded, Charles found himself in the full and secure possession of Bretagne; while Maximilian, the only power he was now at war with, was unable to prosecute some advantages he had obtained by surprizing St. Omer and Arras. He therefore was obliged to enter into a treaty with Charles at Senlis; which turned out greatly to his honour, on account of the passion with which Charles still prosecuted his Neapolitan expedition. By this treaty, Maximilian recovered the person of his daughter; and the counties of Burgundy, Artois, Charolois, with the lordship of Negent, were to be restored to Maximilian, as father and guardian to Philip of Austria; who, when he was of age, was likewise to receive Hedin, Aire, and Bethune; but to hold the whole of the crown of France; and Arras was to be restored to Charles.

The incident of the famous Perkin Warbeck's appearance, was now of service to the French court. It is certain that he was invited thither by Charles, who believed him to be the real son of Edward IV. and assigned him appointments suitable to that quality. A strong presumption that Perkin was no impostor, arises from Charles not having secured his person, and given him up, at the time of the treaty of Estaples;

ples ; which he might easily have done. Be this as it will, Henry sent a most magnificent embassy to Maximilian's court, requiring that Perkin should be driven out of his dominions ; but receiving no satisfaction, he interdicted all intercourse between England and Maximilian's subjects.

This step was greatly to the advantage of Charles, who now proceeded in his negotiation with Ferdinand the Catholic, for the restitution of Roussillon and Cerdagne. Ferdinand was the most faithless, but the most politic, prince of that age ; and perceiving that the restitution of those two counties met with vast difficulty, he is said to have employed a cordelier to corrupt the famous Oliver Maillard, confessor to Charles ; who pretended that the only thing which troubled his father, Lewis, on his death-bed, was his not having restored those two counties to the crown of Spain. It is said that the dutchess of Bourbon's confessor, who was corrupted likewise, employed the same arguments with her ; and both the confessors added, that Lewis was suffering intolerable pains in purgatory on that account. But the truth is, that Charles was so unaccountably bent upon his Neapolitan expedition, that there required little management to persuade him to restore the two provinces, as he did, to Ferdinand, upon the latter promising to pay him three hundred thousand crowns ; which sum was likewise remitted upon Ferdinand engaging not to make war upon France, or to assist any of her enemies.

Vol. X. p. 216, 217. Henry VII. in the mean time, put Charles out of all apprehension with regard to the safety of his dominions, by acceding to the treaty of Senlis ; to which he was now, in part, necessitated by the situation of his affairs. We have already, in the passages quoted in the margin, given a full account of the grounds and pretensions of Charles's expedition to Naples ; and we shall here only supply what the nature of our undertaking obliged us to omit before.

Charles abused by deceitful favourites. Charles, like his father and some of the ablest of his predecessors, was swayed by undeserving favourites. He had been long disgusted with the wise counsels of the dutchess of Bourbon ; and he had, for some time, given himself up to his valet de chambre, Stephen de Vers, and one Brissonnet ; men equally mean in their abilities as their birth ; who, finding that his ruling passion was to conquer Naples, had flattered it ; and, contrary to the advice of his wisest counsellors, they had encouraged him to accept of the invitation made him by Lewis the Moor, who governed Milan in right of his nephew John Galeazzo.

Lewis was noted for infidelity, perjury, and every vice that can stain a prince or a man. We have already mentioned the character of Ferdinand, king of Naples ; but, above all, pope Alexander VI. to whom Charles trusted, was a monster of mankind. Ferdinand died while Charles was hastening his preparations ; and Alexander VI. not only gave his son Alphonse, Alphonso, who was so immensely rich that he was able to bribe him, the investiture of Naples, but sent a message to Charles, commanding him not to proceed in his expedition.

Charles, before he set out, might have obtained a tribute ibid, 218. of fifty thousand crowns a year, and the superiority of the kingdom of Naples; but he rejected them, and appointed the duke of Bourbon to be regent of France during his absence. When he was at Asti, waiting for his artillery, he fell ill of the small-pox; but, upon his recovery, his ambition was flattered by his worthless favourites; who informed him, that Paleologus, the nephew and heir of the late emperor of Constantinople, had resigned to him all his right to the Greek empire.

This chimerical resignation inspired Charles with the His right thoughts even of universal monarchy; but he little knew, to the that, by this time, pope Alexander had strengthened himself Greek empire by an alliance with the emperor Bajazet II. and with the Venetians; and that Ferdinand, king of Spain, notwithstanding his late engagements, had sent to sea a fleet for the assistance of Alphonso; and was taking measures for forming a very powerful confederacy against him. Charles, as we have already seen, marched to Italy; and was at the head of an army which the feeble Italian troops could not withstand. The duke of Orleans, who commanded his fleet, beat that of Alphonso; and Stuart, lord of Aubigni, who commanded the van of his army, prevented Alphonso's son, Ferdinand, duke of Calabria, from entering Romania.

But Charles, with all these specious appearances of success, His needy was soon in the most despicable circumstances. He had no circumstances. money; and the flower of his army, which was composed of Swiss soldiers, could not live without pay. He raised a sum upon the jewels which the duchess of Savoy and the marchioness of Montferrat lent him; and he forced Peter de Medici to advance him two hundred thousand crowns. He then entered Florence as a conqueror, and demanded of the citizens terms that were equally rash and unreasonable; but they were rejected with great spirit by the Florentine magistrates, who had banished Peter de Medici, and desired Charles to beat his drums, while they would ring their bells, if he pretended to proceed to military execution. Charles wanted only money, and making up a hasty agreement with the Florentines, he restored Sienna and Pisa to their liberty. He continued, however, still deaf to all proposals of accommodation; and, on the last day of the year 1493, he entered Rome in triumph, armed at all points, in the midst of his army, and by torch light; while the pope thought proper to shut himself up in the castle of St. Angelo. Charles had, at this time, two opportunities of signalizing his justice; but he neglected both: for he neither punished Lewis the Moor, who had poisoned his nephew and usurped his dukedom; nor deposed the pope, according to the advice of the best and wisest of the cardinals.

His great success.

Vol. VIII.
p. 114. et seq.

While Charles remained in Rome, he affected to behave as its master, by performing within it several acts of sovereignty; but, in reality, he was, in his heart, the slave of the pope. His favourite, Brissonnet, had been made bishop of St. Malo, and had been promised a cardinal's hat. This prevailed with him to interpose his good offices in favour of the pope with Charles, who was ready to have pointed his dreadful artillery, then the terror of all Italy, against the walls of St. Angelo's castle. Upon the pope's offering to capitulate, a negotiation was set on foot. The pope put Charles in possession of several strong places; gave his son, Cæsar Borgia, as an hostage for his good faith; bestowed the investiture of Naples upon Charles; and resigned into his hands Jem, the Turkish prince; whose adventures and life we have already recounted at large.

Charles having concluded this treaty, set his holiness at liberty; and, monster as he was, he appeared with greater splendour than ever upon the pontifical throne, borrowing lustre from the weakness of Charles. That prince paid him his homage of obedience, as the eldest son of the church, attended by Gannay, first president of his parliament at Paris. He kissed his feet; he served him at high mass; and he took his seat in the church below the cardinal-dean.

He conquers Na- ples.

In the mean while, Alphonso, finding that he was detested by his subjects, resigned his crown to his son Ferdinand and turned monk; and Charles, who had caused himself to be declared emperor of the East at Rome, proceeded to Naples; which he entered in triumph without the least resistance; while its late king, Ferdinand, absolved his subjects from their oath of allegiance, and retired to the island of Ischia.

His mis-
ment.

Charles was now in a situation that portended a triumph of folly over wisdom. He had, by the prosperous career of his affairs, shewn the fallibility of those counsellors who had endeavoured to dissuade him from passing farther than the Milanese, or Rome at most. A little steadiness, foresight, and condescension, might have fixed him upon the throne, which he had so unaccountably mounted; but, by his dissipation, he lost his acquisitions and glory. His time was spent in empty shews and diversions; and, instead of applying himself to the regulation of his new conquest, he gave himself up to his worthless minions, who bartered all his favours for money; and he expressed such a contempt for his new subjects, that, within ten or twelve days after his arrival, they were ripe for a revolt.

Confederacy

All this while, the confederacy against him was forming at Venice in the manner we have already seen. The parties were, the faithless pope; Maximilian, the emperor of Germany; and his son, the arch-duke Philip; Ferdinand, king of

of Spain; Lewis the Moor; and the republic of Venice. So against formidable an alliance roused him from his delusion; and, him. upon being assured by Commines, his resident at Venice, that the league had been, for some time, signed, he prepared to return to France by the way of Rome. He had been infatuated enough to discover to the pope his designs upon the Greek empire, and to name the friends there on whom he depended. His holiness betrayed all he knew to Bajazet, who immediately seized and put them to death.

Charles left the count of Montpensier, viceroy, and d'Aubigny, constable, of Naples, but with no more than five, some say four, thousand men, to maintain their authority; and he gave the duchy of Nola to his favourite Stephen Vers.

Charles then marched towards Rome; and was convinced He de- of the treacherous part the pope had acted, by his flying to seats the Perugia. His army did not amount to above nine thousand confederates; while that of the confederates, consisting of thirty rates, thousand, lay near Fornovo, in Placentia, commanded by the prince of Mantua, who had lined the banks of the Taro, which Charles intended to pass, with eight thousand choice Venetian and Milanese troops. Charles engaged them, and killed three thousand of their best men; with the loss, according to some writers, of no more than fourscore of his own; though the prince of Mantua plundered his baggage, and prevented his passing the Taro.

The duke of Orleans was, at this time, besieged in Novara by Lewis the Moor; who being unfaithful to all parties, the king, secretly made his peace with Charles; which prince was advancing from Asti to disengage the duke. Lewis the Moor Naples. was induced to this conduct by the certainty he received that Charles, in a few days, would be joined by sixteen thousand Swiss; which he accordingly was. Lewis bought his peace with a large sum of money; which he gave to Charles and the duke of Orleans, together with Novara and the port of Spezzia, with a promise to send succours to the French in Naples.

We have already seen the mortifications that Charles underwent on this occasion; and how Ferdinand, by the assistance of Gonsalvo, the great captain, and his Spanish troops, recovered that kingdom almost as rapidly as Charles had acquired it; though his constable, d'Aubigny, had gained a victory in Italy. ibid.
p. 220.

Upon the return of Charles to France, Vers, the new duke of Nola, attended him, and endeavoured to re-inspire him with the thoughts of resuming his Italian expedition; but to profit by what was past. He represented to him, that the Italian states, having just tasted of liberty by his late expedition, would repair to his standards like one man; that Florence especially would advance him money to pay his Swiss troops; and, that the confederacy against him, being composed composed of members who had different views and interests, was now, in a manner, dissolved. On the other hand, the cardinal-bishop of St. Malo, who had been the chief adviser of the late expedition, dissuaded him, from a view of the ruined condition of his affairs in Naples. Montpensier, after being obliged to capitulate, died of the plague; and d'Aubigni, after defending Agropoli with great courage and conduct, could obtain no more than an honourable retreat. The emperor, Maximilian, had been invited by Lewis the Moor into Italy, where he recovered Pisa; and the Florentines had deserted the French party.

Charles was, at this time, divided between the pursuit of pleasure and that of ambition; but he discovered no badness of heart. He sought to reconcile the passions of love and power; and he resided chiefly in the southern parts of his dominions, that he might be ready to enter Italy as soon as his affairs called upon him. His generals had defeated an army which Ferdinand of Spain had sent to attack his dominions on the side of Arragon; but he soon made a treaty which accommodated all differences with that court.

The weaknesses of Charles seem chiefly to have been owing to his want of education; and the bad choice he made of favourites, towards the close of his reign, leaves no room to believe that they had any hand in many excellent measures which he executed for the benefit of his kingdom. He founded the great council which still subsists in the French monarchy; and, being sensible of his want of education, he attempted to repair it by applying to the study of history, especially that of his own kingdom. His affability and courtesy gained the affections of all who approached him; and, at last, his worthless favourites found themselves obliged to employ every art to divert him from his application to business. He intended to have united the parliament of Dijon to that of Paris; but being made sensible of the inconveniences that must attend such a union, he retracted the edict he had published for that purpose. He blamed the keenness which the duke of Orleans's impatience to possess himself of the Milanese, to which he had a family right, for his miscarriages in Italy; and he set apart two days in a week for giving audience to all persons who addressed him. While he was thus endeavouring to retrieve his former faults, his favourites redoubled their assiduities to recall him to the pursuit of pleasure.

After he had made proper dispositions for entering Italy, a second time, with an army; and fortified himself by engagements which, probably, would have been successful; he was diverted by an amour with one of his queen's maids of honour; and he offered the command of his army to the duke of Orleans; who, being sensible that he had many enemies, especially in his government of Normandy, and that the health of Charles was daily declining, refused it. By this time, Charles's young son the dauphin, who was but three years and a half old, was dead, and Charles was his only childless. As he was now more exasperated than ever at the duke of Orleans, who being the next heir to the crown, did not behave with a proper decency; upon the dauphin's death, Charles applied himself with more attention than ever to the affairs of government. Being convinced of the integrity and wisdom of the duke and dutchess of Bourbon, he recalled their friends to his council board; he eased his subjects of some of their heaviest taxes; he reduced the expences of his court; he formed a plan for living upon the revenues of his domains, and of raising no extraordinary taxes but by the advice of his states.

But all those excellent resolutions were frustrated by his death, which happened by a fit of apoplexy, on the sixth of April 1498, at the castle of Amboise, in the twenty-eighth year of his age, and the fifteenth of his reign. Some minutes before his death, he had struck his head against a balcony, as he was leading his queen into a gallery to see some of his lords playing at tennis; and being suddenly seized with the apoplectic stroke, he died upon a wretched couch.

From what has been said, the reader can easily form a just idea of this prince's character, and that the root of all his misconduct lay in his want of education, which was entirely owing to the jealousy of the king his father. His wife, the heiress of Bretagne, notwithstanding her former aversion to his, and his repeated infidelities to her, bed, was inconsolable at his death, and changed the usual mourning of the queens of France from white to black. He was most sincerely bewailed by all his domestics, two of whom died of grief, upon seeing his dead body deposited in his tomb at St. Dennis. Before we close this character, we must observe, that it was owing to Charles VIII. that the kingdom of Provence was finally annexed to the crown of France.

Lewis XII. surnamed the Father of his People.

CHARLES V. or the Wise, had two sons, the unhappy Charles VI. who succeeded him, and Lewis, duke of Orleans, who was killed by the duke of Burgundy, and who, by his wife Velentina, daughter and heiress to the duke of Milan, had three sons, Charles duke of Orleans, Philip, count of Vertus, and John, count of Angoulesme. This Charles duke of Orleans, was the same who remained so long a prisoner in England, and, who, on his return to France, claimed the duchy of Milan as his birthright. His son, by his third wife, daughter to the duke of Cleves, was

Lewis duke of Orleans, of whom we are now to treat, and who, according to the salic law, was the undoubted successor to Charles VIII. in the crown of France. He had been contracted at the solicitation of his father, to the second daughter of Lewis XI. almost at the moment of her birth; but that princess, as she grew up, appearing to be deformed, the duke would have gladly declined the match, had he not stood in awe of her father's displeasure. He spent the more early part of his life in gaiety and dissipation; but he possessed so winning a manner, and was so agreeable in his deportment towards all ranks of subjects, that he had few or no personal enemies. His friendships were lasting, as appeared by the attachment he always had to the count of Longueville, and George d'Amboise, on whose account he quarrelled with the late king, because he did not obtain a cardinal's hat for him at the time he got one for Brissonnet. Upon his accession to the crown he discovered every amiable quality of heart, and the most exalted principles of virtue. He was then thirty-six years of age, and when one of his courtiers put him in mind that lord Trimouille, who had made him prisoner at the battle of St. Aubin, was still in being, he made that memorable answer, "That it was unbecoming in a king of France to resent the injuries that had been done to a duke of Orleans." Though he never lived in good terms with the duke and dutchess of Bourbon, who had been long laid aside, yet he shewed his great sense of their merit, by recalling them to court, and leaving them at liberty to dispose of their great estate, (which, if they should die without heirs male, was to revert to the crown) to their daughter, who was betrothed to the young count of Montpensier. He shewed great regard for the queen dowager, and he even left her the sovereignty of Bretagne, to which she chose to retire. Immediately upon his coronation at Rheims, on the twenty-seventh of May 1497, he abolished a tenth of the public imposts, and continued all officers of state, and magistrates in their places. Those acts of benevolence were attended by some of vigour and public justice. He chastised the petulance of the university and preachers of Paris, who were then the most insolent of mankind; he re-established military discipline in the army, and executed an excellent civil police all over his kingdom.

He obtains a divorce from his queen.

Lewis, sensible that he was not upon good terms with the late king at the time of his death, effaced the memory of their differences in the minds of the people, by ordering him a most magnificent funeral. Having no prospect of heirs with his wife Jane, daughter to Lewis XI. he applied to the infamous pope Alexander VI. for a divorce. The execrable ambition of that pope rendered him a proper instrument for that purpose, as Lewis thought he could not purchase what he solicited at too dear a price. His holiness ness sought to aggrandise his family, especially his favourite son, the famous Cæsar Borgia, and his friendship was necessary to Lewis, who, besides the divorce, was meditating the conquest of Milan and Naples. Alexander resolved to gratify him, but upon his own terms. He gave his son, Cæsar, a bull, appointed the bishops of Alby, and Ceuta, with the cardinal of Luxembourg, commissioners for trying the validity of the king's marriage. The queen was persuaded by the university and people of Paris, who venerated her father's memory, to oppose the divorce, she having been now married for twenty years; but she shewed no concern when it took place, and the king allowed her the revenues of the dutchy of Berry, which she employed in charitable purposes. Lewis, in return for this favour, gave Borgia a pension of twenty thousand crowns, with a company of a hundred armed men to attend him as guards; besides a promise of matching him with d'Albret's daughter, a lady of high quality and fortune; upon which, the pope gave him leave to quit the church, and he was made, by Lewis, duke of Valentinois.

Lewis then married the widow of his predecessor, who and married still retained an affection for his person, and he thereby re-ries the covered Bretagne, which by the articles of marriage between queen Charles and that princess, might have been for ever alienat-dowager. ed from the crown of France. After this marriage, Lewis took upon himself the title of king of France, the Two Sicilies, and Jerusalem; which he claimed in right of his predecessor, and as heir to the house of Anjou, being duke of Milan, as heir to the Galeazzo family, and duke of Bretagne, in right of his wife.

The emperor Maximilian had invaded Burgundy, on ac- He pre- count of the non execution of the treaty of Senlis, with pares to regard to the towns that were to be given up to the arch-inva- duke, who was then of age. Maximilian's, or rather his Italy. son's, troops were defeated; but Lewis was so intent upon his Italian expedition, that every thing between him and the archduke was amicably adjusted, and the latter performed homage to Guy de Rochefort, chancellor of France, for the counties of Flanders, and Artois. Lewis next addressed himself to Henry VII. of England, who was easily prevailed upon to give him the strongest assurances that he would not attack his dominions in his absence. He like- Vol. X. wife renewed his alliances with the Scots, and engaged to p. 221. give the Venetians, who had made already great progress against the Milaneses, part of that dutchy. By the advice of George d'Amboise, who was now archbishop of Rouen, and the cardinal legate in France, he gave the command of his troops to Aubigni, Lewis duke of Luxembourg, and Trivulzi, a native of Milan, but a general of unquestioned abilities.

We have already seen the rapid progress of the French, ibid. who made themselves masters of all the Milaneses, excepting p. 222, the them by Lewis the Moor's governor. Lewis XII. remained in France till he heard of his great successes in the Milanese, and then he and his minister, the cardinal d'Amboise, passing the Alps, arrived at Milan, which Lewis triumphantly entered in ducal robes. By this time, Trivulzi, with a detachment of the French army, had recovered Genoa from the power of Lewis the Moor; and it again fell under the French government. Trivulzi, was next appointed governor of Milan, and a new administration of justice was introduced into that dutchy by the cardinal d'Amboise, who advised Lewis to abolish all distinction of party; to diminish the taxes of the natives, and to restore to their country such of them as had been banished by the Moor. After the conquest of Milan, Lewis received the compliments of all the foreign ministers, the Neapolitans excepted, and acted in every respect as arbiter of the Italian states.

Lewis then applied himself to preparations for the conquest of Naples, by making a league with the Florentines, and another in the nature of a treaty of partition, with the perfidious Ferdinand the catholic king of Spain; who had himself an eye upon that crown, and who, unknown to Frederic, king of Naples, whom he pretended to assist and defend, bargained for the possession of Apulia and Calabria.
 The unhappy Frederic more than suspected Ferdinand's perfidy, and even offered to become tributary to Lewis, if he would defend him in the possession of his crown; a request which Lewis, who was passionately fond of the title, most impolitically rejected.

prisoner.

While the French were conquering Naples, Lewis the Moor had applied to Maximilian for assistance; but obtaining none, he took into his pay eight thousand Swiss.
Lewis, on this occasion, was guilty of the same fault that his predecessor had committed after he had conquered Naples, by suffering his officers and soldiers to oppress the inhabitants, who therefore detested them. As to Lewis, he returned to Lyons; but the Moor marched with his Swiss to Milan, and was readily received into that capital, from whence he forced Trivulzi to fly, and to shut himself up in Novara, where he was besieged. Pavia and Parma followed the fate of Milan, and submitted to the Moor; but, upon the advance of the French and Venetians to relieve Novara, the Moor was betrayed by his Swiss officers, and delivered up to the French, who sent him prisoner to France.
Lewis was so pleased with the recovery of Milan, that he sent a reinforcement of French troops to Borgia, with which the latter conquered almost all Romania. This gave umbrage to the Venetians, and they persuaded Lewis to recall his auxiliaries, on pretence that he wanted them for the conquest of Naples.

Frederic had not yet full proof of Ferdinand's intentions. He con- to conquer Naples, and Gonsalvo remained in possession of quers great part of Calabria, which Ferdinand had engaged himself Naples and to deliver up. Pope Alexander acceded to the secret treaty gives a between the two kings, and gave to each the investiture of pension to the territory he had portioned out for himself. Frederic its king. being now certain of Ferdinand's treachery, and unable to prevent its effects, resolved to throw himself upon the gene- rofity of Lewis. He had garrisoned Capua, which the French army then on its march against him, took and plundered.

Frederic signed an order for all his places of strength to be p. 224. surrendered to d'Aubigni, while he himself, with the appro- bation of Lewis, took shipping for France, where he lived and died, upon a pension. Lewis appointed Lewis of Ar- magnac, duke of Nemours, to be viceroy of Naples, and he soon quarrelled with Gonsalvo, the Spanish general, about the limits of their several divisions. The duke of Nemours was hot-headed, and entered upon hostilities against Gon- salvo, who was obliged to retire to Borletta; so that the French got possession of almost all his government.

We have already related the compromise entered into ibid. between Lewis and Philip of Austria, which Gonsalvo, who had now received reinforcements, refused to regard, and he beat and killed the duke of Nemours in a battle, which was attended with the surrender of all the cities, in the kingdom, to the Spaniards. Ferdinand likewise disowned what had been done by his son-in-law, Philip of Austria, and Lewis, who was exasperated beyond measure at his proceedings, resolved to invade his dominions. As the remains of his But loses Neapolitan army still kept possession of Gaeta, Lewis sent an it. army to their assistance, but it was beaten on the twenty- sixth of December 1503, by Gonsalvo, who immediately after reduced Gaeta, by capitulation, which suffered the French officers and soldiers to return home. Lewis d'Ars, one of the former, disowned the capitulation, and being joined by such of his countrymen as still remained in Naples, he marched in good order, in the face of the Spanish army, through the heart of Italy.

While Lewis was suffering those disasters in Italy, he His war attacked Spain by sea and land. One of his armies was with Spain commanded by the lord d'Albret, and the marshal de Gie; unsuccess- but, though it penetrated as far as Fontarabia, it did nothing ful. worth mentioning, and on its return it joined another army under marshal de Rieux, which had laid siege to Saluces, but was obliged by the Spaniards to raise it. The fleet of Lewis was no more fortunate than his land troops had been, for after cruising for some time on the coasts of Spain, it returned to Marseilles.

Lew

His a- Lewis XII. at this time, had no sons, but by his marriage contract with his wife, his eldest daughter Claude, was about the to inherit the dutchy of Bretagne. It was natural for Lewis marriage to make an ample provision for her, as she could not succeed to his crown; but he agreed to give her in marriage of his daughter, to Charles, the son of Philip of Austria, a child of two years old, upon condition that Maximilian should give him the investiture of the Milaneze, which was to be declared a female fief, holding of the empire, and therefore capable of descending to Claude. This match has been generally condemned, as tending too much to aggrandize the house of Austria. Ferdinand the Catholic likewise took umbrage at Philip affecting an independency upon himself, and he prevailed upon Maximilian to refuse to ratify what had been agreed upon by Philip; but at last it was agreed, that the match should take place, but that Lewis and Ferdinand should give up to Charles and Claude, their respective rights to the kingdom of Naples. Ferdinand refused, as Gonsalvo had done, to ratify this agreement; and as we have already seen, Gonsalvo expelled the Spaniards out of Naples. So faithless a conduct rendered the Catholic king detested by all parties; and Lewis, Maximilian, and Philip, resolved to negotiate without him.

by the treaty of Blois. A treaty was according concluded at Blois; by which it was agreed, that Charles of Luxembourg should marry madame Claude, and that the king of France should receive the investiture of Milan, to descend to his heirs male, and, in default of them, to the females. It was likewise agreed, that room should be left for Ferdinand to accede to the treaty, provided that, four months after the ratification, he should yield up the government of Naples to the archduke Philip, to be held by him till the marriage should be consummated. Those stipulations were equally impolitic and unjust on the part of Lewis. It excluded Frederic of Arragon, and his son Alphonso, who were the true heirs of the kingdom of Naples, from all succession to that crown; and it dismembered from the crown of France Milan, Burgundy, Bretagne, and many other estates.

Julius II. chosen The death of pope Alexander VI. gave a new complexion to the affairs of Lewis in Italy. He was succeeded by Pius III. who reigned but a few days. The French army lay then near Rome, and the cardinal d'Amboise, who governed Lewis with an absolute sway, aspired at the papacy, which he probably would have carried, had he not been persuaded by the Italian cardinals to order the French army to retire to a distance, that his election might have some appearance of freedom; but this order was no sooner obeyed, than cardinal la Rovere, the warlike pope Julius II. was chosen. It was thought, not without reason, that this false step of the cardinal not only lost him the popedom, but cost his master the kingdom of Naples, because the French lost the season for for relieving their countrymen there. While the treaty of Blois was negotiating, Ferdinand amused Frederic, the late king of Naples, with the hopes of being restored to that crown, and concluded with Lewis a truce for the countries near the Pyreneans.

By this time, all France condemned the treaty of Blois; and when Lewis began to reflect upon it seriously, together with the defeats and the ill usage he had received from Ferdinand, he resolved by all means to break through his engagements. He had, by cardinal d'Amboise, dropt to Maximilian's and Philip's ambassadors at Blois, a hint of a general confederacy against the Venetians, who were then formidable to all the crowned heads in Europe, and particularly obnoxious to Charles, on account of their possessions in the Milaneſe. He sent the cardinal d'Amboise into Germany to receive the investiture of Milan from Maximilian, and he succeeded at a considerable expence of money, paid to that needy emperor, who seemed to have laid aside all thoughts of the confederacy against the Venetians. So many disappointments and difficulties, had, at this time, a most unfavourable effect upon the health of Lewis, who fell ill, and his life was despaired of by his physicians. When he was thought to be past recovery, his queen gave orders that all her richest moveables should be sent to the castle of Nantes; but they were stopt at Saumur, by the marshal de Gie, which the queen resented so much, that she prevailed with Lewis, upon his recovery, to remove the marshal from all his employments.

The death of Isabella of Castile, soon after the treaty of Blois was concluded, gave a new turn to the affairs of the continent. She had named her husband Ferdinand, to be the administrator of all her inheritance, during the minority of duke Charles, who was not to be of age till his twenty-first year. Philip of Austria, who had married her daughter, looked upon this as a fraudulent act, obtained by Ferdinand's interest, and Philip made preparations to take possession of Castile and Leon, in his wife's right, and intimated the same to Ferdinand, who saw that he must resign the best part of his kingdom. That crafty prince made Henry of England his friend, and found means to conciliate the friendship of Lewis likewise. Lewis had a sister, Mary, who had been married to the viscount of Narbonne, second son to Gaston, count of Foix, by whom she had Gaston de Foix, and a daughter, Germana, of whom her uncle Lewis was excessively fond. This lady had been destined to be the wife of Ferdinand, duke of Calabria, the true heir of the crown of Naples; but Ferdinand, the Catholic, found means to defeat that project, and he sent an artful ecclesiastic, but without any character, to propose to Lewis a match between himself and Germana de Foix, and offering to settle the crown of Naples upon the heirs of

of the marriage. Lewis received the proposal with great pleasure, and renounced all pretensions to that crown; upon receiving from Ferdinand a hundred thousand ducats for the expences of the war. He insisted, however, that all the Neapolitan nobility, whose persons had been imprisoned, or estates confiscated, should be reinstated in their country and possessions; to which Ferdinand agreed.

And Lewis
evades the execution
of the treaty of Blois.

The ambition of the house of Austria being thus defeated with regard to Naples, the next care of Lewis was how to evade the performance of the treaty of Blois. He dissimulated so well, that it was with an apparent reluctance he consented to call an assembly of the states at Tours, in order to deliberate upon its validity. After a pretended examination, it was disapproved and rejected, and before the assembly broke up, Lewis married his daughter Claude to the count of Angoulesme, the heir of his crown. Though this marriage gave a terrible blow to the hopes of Philip, yet he considered it as the effect of his father-in-law, Ferdinand's policy, and being now upon his death-bed, he appointed Lewis to be the guardian of his infant son, Charles of Luxembourg, afterwards the famous emperor Charles V. Ferdinand the Catholic, had by this time, punctually executed all his engagements with regard to Naples, to which country he repaired, with his new queen; and upon his return to resume the government of Castile, after the death of Philip, he had a conference with Lewis, who was then at Savona, and he advised the Genoese to be easy under the French government. They did not, however, take his council, for in the year 1506, they expelled the French governor, and new modelled their constitution, under pretence that the power of the nobility was become too intolerable to be longer born, and seized upon Spezzia, which they delivered back to Lewis. He resolved to chastise in person the ring-leaders of this revolution, especially as the insurgents behaved with the most brutal cruelty towards the French. He advanced with his army to Asli, where the Genoese offered to submit, but it was only with a view of gaining reinforcements. Lewis rejected their suit. His general, the marquis of Mantua, attacked them in the rear, as he himself did in the front, and they were defeated, with the loss of three thousand killed and taken prisoners. He then besieged their city, and the senate sent a deputation out to implore his compassion. Lewis, exasperated at the citizens having chosen a silk-dyer for their duke, and at the indignities they had done to his majesty, refused to see them; but by the intercession of marshal d'Ambocise, it was resolved to pardon the mutineers, if they would lay down their arms. They were so far from agreeing to this, that, notwithstanding all the remonstrances of the senate and nobility, they again attacked the French, and were defeated with considerable loss.

loss. Upon this, the most forward of the mutineers left the Lewis city, into which, Lewis made a triumphal entry, and par-becomes doned the senate. He then took the city and republic into master of his protection; but declared it to be unalienably annexed Genoa, to his crown, and that it should have no laws but such as he should prescribe, by his governor the marshal d'Amboise, or his successors. To those important conditions he added many others, equally mortifying to the inconstant Genoese, and obliged them to pay the expences of the expedition.

Lewis having gloriously finished this war, had the inter-and is review we have already mentioned with Ferdinand the Catholic, conciled at Savona; and as an undoubted testimony of the merits to the of Gonsalvo, the great captain, who had driven his troops emperor out of Naples, he honoured him with a gold chain from his own neck, though he knew Ferdinand to be so jealous of that general, that he was carrying him back little better than a prisoner to Spain. The empire of Germany was alarmed at the progress of the French king in Italy, and put Maximilian at the head of an army to oppose his progress, and to attack the Venetians his allies.

By this time, Lewis and Ferdinand had secretly resolved upon the league which was afterwards formed at Cambray against the Venetians. The motives and progress of which Vol. X. we have already fully described in the passages referred to p. 226, in the margin. Maximilian had offered the Venetians a 227, truce. The marshal Trivulzi, who commanded for Lewis, et seq. rejected it, because it was not to be general, but the Vene- Vol. IX. tians accepted of it, notwithstanding his dissent; by which p. 86, 87. the duke of Gueldres, Lewis's ally, was in the most imminent danger of being crushed by Maximilian in the Low Countries. Maximilian, who had flattered himself with great expectations in Italy, was still more exasperated than Lewis was, at being obliged to accept of so disgraceful a truce. The emperor and Lewis were easily reconciled to each other by the ministry of the cardinal d'Amboise, and Margaret, dutchess dowager of Savoy; and there scarcely was a state in Europe who had not some demand upon, or some matter of resentment against the Venetians. It certainly was against all the maxims of policy, for Lewis to enter so warmly as he did into the league of Cambray. The Venetians were his natural allies, and it was natural in them to maintain him in the possession of the Milaneze against Maximilian, who in fact aspired to the monarchy of all Italy, and who, with the pope, was to be the almost only gainer by the war.

The bishop of Pavia was the only counsellor Lewis had who had the honesty to represent this, and much more, against his entering into the league; but Lewis, and his minister the cardinal, had conceived so rooted an aversion to the Venetians, that the latter was sent to the court of Vol. X. Margaret of Savoy, who by virtue of the full powers she p. 228 had had from Maximilian, agreed that Lewis should receive the investiture of the Milanese simply for himself, his heirs, and successors. Lewis was likewise flattered with the hopes of recovering all that the Venetians possessed beyond the Adda, in the Milanese.

He defeats
the Vene-
tians,

By the indefatigable pains of the cardinal d'Amboise, a body of Swiss was taken into French pay; and the army of Lewis was ready to march by the first of April, 1509. The queen, whom Lewis loved, opposed his passing the Alps in person; but the cardinal's counsels, and the king's hatred of the Venetians, prevailed over her remonstrances; and he set out with a full resolution of taking the first opportunity to fight the enemy. His army, in which were eight thousand Swiss foot, was one of the best that had ever marched from France to Italy. Its van was commanded by the marshals Chaumont and Trivulzi; the main body by himself; and the rear by the count of Longueville. Lewis was so unhappy, that he completely defeated the Venetians at the battle of Ghiarra d'Adda; where they lost their brave general Alviano, and five thousand, some say nine thousand, men, besides prisoners; and Lewis, by the rapid progress of his arms, reduced all the Venetian part of the Milanese.

Cardinal d'Amboise, though ill of a slow fever, had followed his master, in a close litter, over the Alps; and had, before this time, perceived his bad policy, in pressing Lewis to enter into the league of Cambray. The Venetians would have yielded up all the territory he wanted, to have purchased his friendship; and he found that the whole stress of the war must lie upon him. He complained of this to Maximilian, who was too weak, and too indolent, to fulfil the engagements he had entered into, though he was to be the chief gainer by the war. The pope equally hated Maximilian and Lewis, and had already shewn his disgust at the latter receiving the investiture of the Milanese. Lewis was sensible of all this; and, by giving peace to Venice, might have still retrieved the false step he had taken: but, from a mistaken delicacy, and the fondness he had for the simple investiture of the Milanese, which he actually had not yet received, he refused the offer made him by the Venetians, of yielding up to him all the towns claimed by the emperor.

Maximilian arrived, at last, at Trent; where he bestowed, on the cardinal d'Amboise, in his master's name, the so much desired investiture of Milan; but not before he had received from the cardinal the sum of sixty thousand crowns. Lewis, notwithstanding the delicacy he affected towards the emperor, shewed more moderation than he had done in the beginning of the war, towards the Venetians. He, indeed, concluded a treaty with the pope; who was forced to allow him the disposal of all the vacant benefices in his dominions; but, by refusing to accept of, or garrison, Maximilian's towns, he saved the republic of Venice; which had actually given

given orders for all her troops and garrisons to withdraw from the continent. Maximilian had sent a commissary to take possession of Padua; the inhabitants would not receive him; they had expelled all the Germans from their city, and they were supported by the Venetians, about the time that Lewis returned with a part of his army to France; and from that period we may date the recovery of the Venetian power and commonwealth from their seemingly unavoidable destruction.

We have already related the differences that happened among the members of the league of Cambray, upon the return of Lewis to France. The ends of pope Julius had been answered, by his recovering all the towns and territories in Italy that had been dismembered from the holy see. Ferdinand had likewise succeeded in his views; and Maximilian was baffled in his attempts to take Padua, though he besieged it with forty thousand men for seventeen days.

The pope now began to unmask his real intentions; which were to drive all the barbarians, as he called the French and Germans, out of Italy. He insisted upon Maximilian making peace with Venice; and not succeeding with him, he applied to the electors, whom he brought over to his interest. Maximilian and Lewis were sensible of the pope's views, and united themselves more closely than ever. The former mortgaged to Lewis the city and citadel of Verona for fifty thousand ducats; but the Venetians, finding the alliance against them weakened, were the less solicitous about Maximilian's efforts.

The pontiff was indefatigable in his endeavours to break the lately cemented union. He gave the investiture of the kingdom of Naples to Ferdinand, in consideration of the yearly tribute of a palfrey and a purse of gold. He absolved the Venetians from their excommunication; and prevailed with the Swiss troops, in the service of Lewis, to demand an augmentation of their pay. Lewis refused to gratify them in this; upon which a very considerable body of them left his service, but he replaced them with Grisons. At last, his holiness openly broke with Lewis, who called an assembly of his clergy at Tours, to deliberate upon the measures he was to take against his holiness.

Cardinal d'Ambois was now dead; but his nephew, the marshal de Chaumont, had repelled the Swiss, in their attempts to penetrate into the Milanese. The assembly at Tours had formally pronounced, that the pope might be treated like any other temporal prince, if he was the aggressor in an unjust war; that his censures ought, in such a case, to be of no validity; that he ought to receive no money out of France; and, that the ecclesiastical benefices should be taxed to maintain a war against him. Lewis, in consequence of this declaration, renewed the treaty of Cambray with the emperor; and took measures for assembling a general council, before which the pope was to be brought to judgment.

The affairs of Lewis, at this time, were managed with great abilities in Italy, where he lost the marshal de Chau-mont; who, though no more than thirty-eight years of age, was one of the most accomplished generals of that time. He was succeeded by Trivulzi; who likewise maintained the glory of the French arms with great success, and beat the pope's parties and armies whenever he engaged them. The famous chevalier Bayard was likewise distinguished for many glorious actions during this Italian war; but the successes of Lewis were more splendid than solid, for he was actually losing upon the main. Julius had excommunicated and attacked his ally the duke of Ferrara, whose defence cost Lewis vast sums. His new, and indeed unnatural, ally, the emperor Maximilian, was rather burthensome than serviceable to him. His enemy, the pope, was closely united with Ferdinand the Catholic, now king of Naples; and his holiness, notwithstanding his repeated defeats, and his labouring under all the diseases attendant upon old age, still continued to be the irreconcilable enemy of Lewis; to whose moderation it was owing that he retained, at this time, even the possession of Rome.

Errors of Lewis.

Vol. X.
p. 234.

Lewis saw his errors when it was too late to retrieve them; and he found all his attempts to convene a general council at Pisa to be ineffectual. His armies in Italy, though maintained at an immense expence, were under no discipline; and were composed chiefly of German and Grison mercenaries. The state of Genoa was daily making efforts to shake off his yoke; and the pope had prevailed with young Henry VIII. the richest and most spirited prince of his age, to declare against him. The root of all those misfortunes lay in the irresolution of Lewis himself. He was now chiefly governed by his queen, who thought it highly impious to make war against his holiness; and he thereby lost all the advantages that the valour of his generals in Italy had acquired. The pope had obliged the assembly at Pisa, where some prelates met, to retire, with disgrace, to Milan; and his proceedings, violent as they were, were seconded by the applause of all Italy, for the hatred he expressed against the barbarians, especially the French.

It was about this time that Maximilian had formed his scheme of being himself made pope, and he began to act with a remarkable coldness towards Lewis. The pope had now framed the confederacy, which he called the holy league, and engaged in it the kings of England and Spain, the Venetians, the Swiss, and many German and Italian states. Henry of England, before he proceeded to hostilities, made a formal requisition of all the French territories formerly belonging to the crown of England. This demand was the more surprising, as he had just finished a treaty with Lewis, and had re-

received all the arrears that had been owing to his father by Charles VIII. and Lewis had given him no pretext for a rupture; but the glory of being defender of the church, supplied, with Henry, all defects of policy and justice. He concluded a treaty with the king of Arragon, seemingly for the conquest of Guienne and the defence of the holy see; but, in reality, to give Ferdinand an opportunity of conquering Navarre for himself; and to oblige Lewis to recall his troops out of Italy; but Lewis wisely renewed the old leagues of his crown with the Scots, and engaged them to invade England.

John d'Albret had married the princess of Navarre; by Artificial which, that crown, so earnestly coveted by Ferdinand, was conducted transferred to the Albret family. The pope, to please Ferdinand, had put Navarre under an interdict; and had managed so artfully, that, instead of Guienne, the English troops had landed in Guipuscoa; where he endeavoured to prevail with the marquis of Dorset, who commanded them, to act under the crown of Navarre. The marquis saw through his design, and disappointed it, by returning to England. In this expedition the English lost above three thousand men, without entering Guienne: but they preserved their superiority at sea; where they defeated the French fleet under admiral Porstmogueré, who blew up his ship as they were sailing out of Brest.

The emperor, Maximilian, who, for the reasons already Gaston de specified, was the only ally that now remained to Lewis, Foix, began to cool in his alliance; and, under many pretexts, general in particularly that of having been no gainer by the league of Italy, Cambray, he began to side with the pope. Lewis perceived Vol. X. the importance of the blow that was aimed at him, and sent p. 235. orders to Gaston de Foix, duke of Nemours, his general in Italy, at all events, to hazard a decisive blow, that might overawe the confederates. De Foix, though no more than twenty-three years of age, was one of the best generals of his time. He had forced the Neapolitan and papal troops to raise the siege of Bologna with disgrace. He had retaken Brescia from the Venetians, and defeated them with the loss of eight thousand of their best troops. Those, and many other, glorious actions, encouraged Lewis to venture a general engagement, before his army in Italy was farther reduced; and de Foix, in order to bring it on, besieged Ravenna with about twenty-two thousand men.

The confederates were commanded by John de Medici is killed; and the flower of the Spanish generals, who, afterwards, but gains made the greatest figures in Europe; but they were entirely the battle defeated with the loss of seven thousand men; and de Foix of Ravenna lost his life in following the pursuit too far. Palice succeeded to the command of the French army, and took Cosena, Imola, Forli, and Ravenna: all which he delivered into the hands of cardinal Sanseverino, with whom he soon after broke.

The victory of Ravenna might have been of the utmost advantage to Lewis, had de Foix been succeeded by a general of equal ability to himself; or had not Lewis, from an ill-judged frugality, left his troops destitute both of pay and support. The emperor began to repent of his new connections, and the Venetians to treat with Lewis. Henry VIII. roused them out of their despondency, by promising to embark, with more vigour than ever, in the alliance; and he and the pope, at last, prevailed with Maximilian to publish his avocatory letters; commanding all the Germans, in the French pay, to leave that service; by which Lewis lost the flower of his army in Italy.

Thus the face of affairs was changed in Italy. The Venetians broke off all connections with Lewis, and took a body of Swiss into their pay. Another body of those mercenaries, to the number of twenty thousand men, reinstated young Maximilian Sforza, son of the Moor, in the duchy of Milan. The Genoese expelled the French, and received Fregosa for their duke. The Venetians took possession of Cremona and Bergamo. The pope recovered Bologna, and all that the French had seized in Romania; while Palice, at the head of scarce four thousand men, retired towards the Milanese. This wonderful revolution was brought about by the determined spirit of pope Julius II. and the gold of Henry VIII. who spent immense sums for the reduction of France, through the instigation of his minister, Wolfey; who was in hopes, thereby, of obtaining the papal tiara.

Avarice of
Lewis,

The avarice of Lewis still continued, more and more, to distress his affairs. Palice had been obliged to evacuate Pavia and Lodi, which the Venetians took possession of. Trivulzi, after being forced to abandon Milan, had retired towards Piedmont; all the military skill and courage of the chevalier Bayard did not enable him to keep his ground; and, in three months after the glorious battle of Ravenna, Lewis had scarcely a foot in Italy, except the citadel of Milan, that he could call his own. A misunderstanding, which was renewed between him and the Venetians, bade fair to put him, once more, in possession of the Milanese. The pope had pressed the Venetians to cede to the emperor all that they had offered him, when Lewis had beaten their troops, after the league of Cambray; but, as they hated and distrusted both Maximilian and the pope, they rejected the proposal, and renewed their engagements with Lewis for his receiving the Milanese, upon their keeping all that they had beyond the Adda.

The warlike pope Julius II. was now dead, and succeeded by Leo X. who pursued his predecessor's plan, for driving all foreigners out of Italy. For this purpose, the holy league was renewed; and it was agreed by the confederating parties, that France should be invaded by the pope, the emperor, and the king of England. The contents of this league was communicated to Lewis by Ferdinand, who betrayed all parties ; and who, upon Lewis promising to give up Navarre, concluded a neutrality.

Nothing could be more impolitic than the passion which Lewis shewed for the recovery of the Milaneſe, at this time, by disfurniſhing his kingdom of troops, at a juncture when it was to be attacked by a powerful confederacy. He trusted to the assurances of Ferdinand, who promised to favour him ; and to the abilities of his general, la Trimouille, which undoubtedly were great. This general was then at the head of sixteen thousand foot, and about eight thousand horse ; and, paſſing the Alps, he and Trivulzi, who ſerved under him, ſoon reduced all the Milaneſe, excepting Como and Novara, which laſt place they beſieged. It was gariſoned by ſix thousand Swiſs, a nation which was now become the inveterate enemies of the French, commanded by Francis Sforza, brother to the deceased duke Maximilian. Notwithſtanding the brave defence made by the gariſon, the place muſt have been taken, had not a freſh army of Swiſs advanced to its relief, who cut Trimouille's army in pieces ; and thus the French once more loſt Milan. Lewis, in vain, exclaimed againſt Ferdinand, whom he accused to have failed in his engagements ; and the Venetians entered into a treaty with the pope ; who, however, could not ſucceed in his attempts to reconcile them with the emperor, or entirely to detach them from Lewis.

The time was now come for the confederates againſt France to begin their operations. The Swiſs had acceded to their alliance, and France was now in more danger than ſhe had known ſince the reign of Charles VI. Lewis, as uſual, had recourſe to negotiations and concessions, and made the pope his friend by giving up the ſchiſmatical prelates of the council of Piſa. It is thought that Lewis's queen, who always abhorred his being at war with the pope, was highly inſtrumental in this reconciliation ; but the confederates ſupplied the loſs of the pope, by the activity of Henry VIII. the valour of the Swiſs, and the treachery of Ferdinand, who once more abandoned Lewis. Henry VIII. had the glory of advancing a hundred thousand crowns to the emperor Maximilian, and of being ſerved by him as a mercenary, in his army, at the rate of an hundred crowns a day. By the league of Mechlin, ſo called from the place where it was concluded, the emperor, Maximilian, was to have Burgundy ; the pope, Provence and Dauphiny ; Henry, Normandy ; and Ferdinand, Guienne.

France,

About the middle of May, 1513, the Engliſh army landed at Calais ; and, on the ſeventeenth of June, it marched towards Terouenne (which had a gariſon of about two thousand men, under Teligni) and inveſted it. Lewis gave orders that it ſhould be relieved. Henry landed in perſon at Calais, at Calais, on the thirtieth of the same month, with a great reinforcement of troops; and being joined by the emperor, who pleaded his inability to execute the engagements he had entered into by the treaty of Mechlin, the English army before Terouenne is said, by French historians, to have amounted to fifty thousand men; but this seems far to exceed the truth.

Spurs.

Lewis was then at Amiens; and the duke of Longueville, who had under him Palice, Bayard, and some of the best French officers, commanded the army that was to act against the English. Several small engagements had passed between the two armies; but, at last, the duke of Longueville threw into it some troops; and, on the sixteenth of August, both armies, by chance rather than design, came to a general engagement; in which the French were entirely defeated. This battle, which we have reason to believe was chiefly owing to the excellent dispositions made by Maximilian, was termed that of the Spurs, because the consternation of the French was so great, that they shewed no alacrity but in flying. The duke of Longueville, Palice, the chevalier Bayard, Bussy, d'Amboise, and most of the French general officers of note, were taken prisoners.

Perhaps historians, the French especially, have been too careless in their relations of this battle; which, in fact, was attended with little loss to the French but that of reputation. Lewis had ordered his generals not to fight, unless they were certain of victory. They had made such dispositions, that they thought they could not fail of it; and had begun the engagement before they discovered that all the measures they had taken had been counter-acted by the enemy; so that, instead of fighting, they fled. Lewis replaced the duke of Longueville with the duke of Angoulesme, the presumptive heir of his crown; and gave him the like orders: but, on the twenty-fourth of August, Terouenne was surrendered, and its fortifications razed.

Lewis re-
news his engagements
with the Scots.

About the time that the league of Mechlin was formed, Lewis had renewed his engagements with James IV. king of Scotland; and, though that prince was married to Henry's sister, prevailed with him to declare war against England. The event was, that James lost his life at the battle of Flodden; where almost all his nobility were cut off. His death and defeat made a prodigious impression upon Lewis, especially when Henry was prevailed upon, by his imperial mercenary, to besiege Tournay; which he soon took. It is thought, not without reason, that Lewis had a secret correspondence with Maximilian; and, that he made Tournay the price of his not being attacked by Henry in a more dangerous quarter than the Low Countries. Tournay capitulated in a few days, as Lewis had given the duke of Angoulesme no orders to relieve it; and its bishopric was given to Wolsey:
upon

upon which, Henry returned to England, and the campaign was closed on that side.

It seems to be next to certain that Lewis had, by this time, secretly gained over Wolsey to his interest; otherwise it is difficult to account for the reasons why Henry did not march from Calais to the gates of Paris with his army, which was the most numerous any king of England had commanded in France. This was the more practicable for Henry, as he had advanced four hundred thousand crowns to Maximilian; which he employed in hiring twenty thousand Swiss, and a large body of German cavalry, under Ulric, duke of Wurtemberg, to invade Burgundy; where they laid siege to Dijon. Trimouille commanded in the place, and did Lewis the most eminent services; even, perhaps, to the saving of his crown.

Having taken some Swiss officers prisoners, he treated Policy of them with so much address and politeness, that they frankly Trimou- owned, that all the antipathy of their nation against the ille.

French was owing to the avarice of Lewis, who had neglected to pay the great arrears due to them from himself and predecessors, amounting to four hundred thousand crowns; that they could not depart from their engagements with the holy see, and Sforza, duke of Milan; and they thought, that Charles, prince of Spain, the same whom we have before called Charles of Luxembourg, had a good right to that part of Burgundy which was stipulated to his family by the treaty of Blois. Trimouille finding all that his prisoners said to be true, employed them to prevail with their chiefs to enter into a negotiation; and it soon terminated in a treaty; by which Trimouille engaged, in his master's name, to gratify the Swiss in all their demands; and paid them twenty thousand crowns of their arrears, by way of advance, besides putting into their hands his own nephew, one of his general officers, and four of the principal citizens of Dijon, as hostages.

Upon the conclusion of the treaty, the Swiss raised the siege, but Lewis refused to ratify the treaty. This exasperated the Swiss, and the hostages were condemned to death. As the whole kingdom of France agreed that Trimouille's conduct had saved their crown, the avarice of Lewis was universally exclaimed against; and he was obliged to ratify the treaty, so far as related to the money; but, before it was paid, the prisoners made their escape.

The system of power in Europe received, at this time, a Lewis re- new turn, through the jealousy which the pope, with great lieved reason, now entertained of the house of Austria. He had, from his in vain, pressed Lewis to ratify that part of the treaty of Di- embarrass- jon which related to the establishment of the Sforza family ment. in the Milaneze. Lewis could not be brought to this, and struck into a plan for totally disuniting the confederacy against him; for he offered his daughter Rene in marriage to the prince of Spain, who was grandson both to Ferdinand and Maximilian, with all his right upon the Milanese and Genoa for her portion. The proposal was greedily embraced by both those princes, though they had already, as far as was in their power, married Charles to the princess Mary of England, Henry's sister. This negotiation was discovered by Acton, Henry's minister at the French court; and the pope, who was alarmed at the thoughts of an Austrian prince being in possession of the Milanese, was soon informed of it.

From the short sketch we have given, the reader will easily perceive, that Henry, who had been, all this time, fighting Ferdinand's and Maximilian's battles, must be enraged beyond measure, at their treachery; that it was the interest of the pope to preserve the ballance of power in Italy, by preventing the proposed match from taking place; and, that the business of Lewis was, to disunite his enemies by any means. The pope prevailed with the latter to enter into a correspondence with Henry, who appeared now to be very placable towards France; and Lewis, who detested, as much as he did, both Maximilian and Ferdinand, laid before Henry, as a pledge of his sincerity, the whole negotiation about the marriage; but it is hard to say what turn affairs might have taken, had it not been for an unexpected event, which happened, about this time, by Lewis becoming a widower.

ment of
the duke
of Longue-ville in England.

French generals, when prisoners in England, have often proved successful negotiators; and been more useful to their country in their civil, than they could have been in their military, capacity. The duke of Longueville, ever since the battle of the Spurs, had been a captive in England; and being a kind of favourite with Henry, he artfully hinted at a match between the princess Mary and Lewis, who was but fifty-six years of age, and therefore might possibly have by her an heir to his kingdom. Henry agreed to the proposal, upon Lewis engaging, instead of receiving from him a fortune with his sister, to pay him an hundred thousand crowns annually for ten years. This negotiation was concluded on the second of August, 1514.

Lewis, while he was yet uncertain as to Henry's determination, had given Richard de la Pole, the nearest heir to the crown of England, of the York branch, the command of ten or twelve thousand troops on the coast of Picardy, probably with a view of his making a descent upon the coast of England, if the negotiation did not succeed; but, upon the treaty being signed, de la Pole's commission was recalled, and he himself retired to Metz upon a pension of six thousand crowns a year allowed him by Lewis.

marries the princess Mary of England.

The duke of Norfolk carried the bride over to Abbeville; where she was received with raptures by the bridegroom, who was more infirm than he was aged. The nuptials were celebrated with the utmost magnificence; and the charms of the bride, who was then but in her seventeenth year, touched the heart of the duke of Angoulesme so much, that that it was with difficulty he was prevailed upon, by a friend, to desist from an attempt to exclude himself from the succession to the crown of France. There is, however, some reason for suspecting that Mary, even at this time, looked upon her future husband, Charles Brandon, who attended her, with no unfavourable eyes. The pope was, by no means, displeased with a match which seemed to defeat the views of the house of Austria in Italy; but he applied himself now to prevent the Swiss from re-entering into the service of France: his great plan being, that all Italy should be governed by Italian sovereigns. He succeeded so far, that Lewis, in pursuit of his favourite measure (that of recovering the Milaneze) by his general, the duke of Bourbon, was obliged to take into his pay sixteen thousand Germans; and, placing himself at their head, with a body of French, he marched to Italy. In the mean while, the Adornas, who commanded Genoa, under Lewis, were deposed from that dukedom; and the French were besieged in the castle of the Lanthorn, which was taken; and the French thereby lost all footing in Genoa.

The constitution of Lewis was then broken so much, that His death, it was irrecoverable; and it was naturally, perhaps justly, thought that his being married, when he was fifty-six years of age, to the most beautiful princess in Europe, contributed to his death; which happened in January, 1515 (he having lived but eighty days with his third wife) in the seventeenth year of his reign.

The kingdom of France, under Lewis XII. was happier character, than, perhaps, it would have been, if governed by a prince of greater genius and ambition. He was, in his private character, a worthy man; and his sole aim was the good of his people. He had his family weakness, that of coveting the sovereignty of the Milaneze; but it was far from costing him so dear as it did his predecessor. His chief stain was avarice, which prevented his counter-acting his enemies; for it is certain, that money, well disposed, might have enabled him to retain Milan; but, at the same time, he was magnificent, if not profuse, in his expences upon his own court and person. The league of Cambray was certainly a wrong measure; but he shewed a particular regard to Ponchier, bishop of Paris, who opposed it; as he did to several other ministers who were of the same sentiments. In short, he had a sincere desire to render his people happy; and he was not ashamed to acknowledge and reform the errors of his government, even when they took their rise from his own obstinacy.

He pushed, perhaps, the principle of frugality too far, because he did not raise upon his people taxes sufficient to maintain his foreign interest against the English and Swiss, or to resent the gross affronts put upon him by the king of Spain. His frugality led him into another error, which was that

that of selling the lucrative places in his government, by which he raised, in his reign, twelve hundred thousand livres in the diocese of Paris. A moderate tax upon the subject would have been less burdensome than such a venality of places; as the purchaser, undoubtedly, raised upon the people what he paid for his employment. This venality, however, did not extend to the courts of law, the expences of which were then very moderate. The whole of his revenue amounted to above thirteen million of livres, which at that time, were equal in value to six hundred and fifty thousand pounds; but the proper deductions and considerations being made, the sum may be now equivalent to about two million, five hundred thousand pounds, and with that inconsiderable sum he defrayed the civil and military expences of his kingdom and court, which was excessively magnificent. He accepted from his parliament a list of three persons to fill up any vacancy in the long robe, and he chose one of the three.

In the year 1499, he published one of the most patriotic edicts that, perhaps, ever issued from a sovereign; for he ordained that the law should always be observed, notwithstanding any orders contrary to law, which a sovereign might be induced to issue through importunity. He was the first French monarch who emancipated his subjects from the tyranny of the soldiers, who had before always laid the peasants under contribution; but by executing five or six of the gens d'armes, he put a stop to that atrocious practice. To conclude his character, though he was not a great genius, yet he was a most excellent king, and the people of France never lived so happy as under his government. Even during his life time, he had the glorious appellation of the Father of his People, and he put up the affronts of even being personally satirized for his parsimony, with the good natured reflection, that he chose the people should rather laugh at his frugality than mourn at his oppression.

We have already seen that he was divorced in 1498, from his first queen Joan of France, who died in 1505. By his second queen, Ann of Bretagne, he had two sons, who died infants, and two daughters, Claude, who was married to his successor the duke of Angoulesme, and Rene, who after being offered and promised to various princes, was, in 1527 married to the duke of Ferrara, and was one of the most amiable women of her time. She died a protestant, in 1575. His third queen, by whom he had no issue, was Mary of England, who survived him eighteen years, and was married to Brandon duke of Suffolk.

 and she retired from court to her husband's favourite castle of Cognac. It was generally thought that she had a passion for Charles, duke of Bourbon, which being slighted, it was converted into a most furious hatred, and created innumerable calamities to her son and his kingdom.

The retired life in which the countess of Angoulesme lived His mi-of his accession, was deservedly looked upon to be the finest gentleman in France. The two great posts of chancellor and constable being then vacant, he gave the former to Anthony du Prat, and the latter to Charles duke of Bourbon.

 He favoured the marriage of Charles Brandon with the queen dowager, and confirmed his treaties of friendship with all the neighbouring powers, that he might be more at leisure to prosecute his family claim upon the dutchy of Milan. His great minister was du Prat, but his favourites were Arthur de Gouffier, and Florimond de Robertet; the former master of his household, and the latter his secretary.
 The public treasury being empty at the time of his accession, by du Prat's advice he raised money from the sale of offices, which he encreased, by adding a chamber to each of his parliaments. Even this was not sufficient to answer his exigencies, for he was obliged to revive the taxes which his predecessor had suppressed. He kept his intended expedition into Italy a profound secret from all but his two favourites; and as a preparative to his success, he endeavoured to cultivate a friendship with pope Leo X. in order to regain the influence of his crown in Genoa. The pope had supported Fregosa in that dukedom; but Francis, by protecting the Adorna, and the Fiesco families, gave Fre- gosa so much trouble, that he secretly embraced the interest of France; and a project was formed for putting Francis in possession of that republic. This being discovered by the Spaniards, they entered and pillaged Genoa, but by the assistance

assistance of Andrew Doria, a noble Genoese, who was admiral to Francis, the schemes of the Spaniards were frustrated, and the Genoese government put itself under the French protection.

His differences with the Swiss.

The vast preparations made by Francis for invading Italy, had alarmed all Europe, but he never discovered his intention till it was on the point of execution. Don Pedro de Novara raised ten thousand Biscyaners and Gascons, for the service of Francis, and the duke of Guelders an equal number of Germans; so that his army, upon a muster, appeared to consist of forty thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse. Before this great body began its march, the king erected his county of Angoulesme into a dutchy, which he gave to his mother; and, at the same time, he declared her regent. The Swiss, ever since they had been disgusted by the parsimony of Lewis XII. had continued to be the declared enemy of France. The Venetians were her friends, because they wanted to recover Verona from the emperor Maximilian. The famous cardinal of Sion, one of the most artful men of his age, undertook to mediate between the Swiss and Francis, whom he betrayed, and encouraged them in their enmity, that he might raise his own importance.

Ferdinand king of Spain was still alive, and being apprehensive that the great preparations of Francis were intended for the recovery of Navarre, he strengthened himself by an alliance with Henry VIII. of England, who was equally jealous that Francis intended to recover Tournay, of which Wolsey was still bishop. The preparations of Francis continued to be so mysterious, that a secret league was entered into between Ferdinand, Maximilian, and the pope, by which the Swiss were to be employed against the French; but the true designs of Francis were no sooner known, than the emperor and Ferdinand withdrew the contingencies they were obliged to furnish, and left the pope and the Swiss to oppose Francis.

Italy.

Francis gave the command of the vanguard of his army to the constable Bourbon, and that of the rear to the duke of Alençon, while he himself, attended by the dukes of Guelders, Lorraine, and Savoy, commanded the main body. He began his march about the beginning of August 1515. He was then no more than twenty-one years of age; but so full of fire and spirit, that he had been known to cry on hearing the gallant exploits of Gaston de Foix at that age. The Swiss had guarded all the common passages over the Alps, so strongly, that Francis had been obliged to make a new road at Roque-Perriere, by which he descended into Piedmont, and surprised Prosper Colonna, the pope's general, who had been sent with a body of troops to observe the motions of the French, but without any declared intention to attack them. The Swiss were not dismayed at Francis penetrating into Piedmont, and continued to skirt his army; but but by the mediation of the pope and the duke of Savoy, a negotiation was set on foot between them, and Francis, who, promised them seven hundred thousand crowns, as the purchase of their friendship. While this treaty was in agitation, it was broken off by the arrival of the cardinal of Sion, with a fresh body of troops and money; and they resolved to attack the French at Marignan, near Milan.

Though Francis had offered them an immense sum for their friendship, yet he disdained being their tributary; and perhaps, the indignation which his subjects conceived at their haughty and unreasonable demands, operated greatly to the victory he gained at Marignan. The Swiss were armed with long spears, and two handed broad swords, and till the day of that battle had been deemed invincible. They had indeed no horse in their army; but the strength and courage with which they fought supplied that defect. The battle began about four in the afternoon, on the thirteenth of September, and lasted for some hours after sunset, when both parties rested on the field of battle; Francis himself making use of the carriage of a cannon for his pillow. Next morning he made the necessary dispositions for renewing the engagement, and about nine, the Swiss, who were destitute of artillery as well as cavalry, were so galled by the French cannon, and the heavy armed horse, that they began their retreat, leaving twelve thousand, out of about twenty-five thousand, men, which their army consisted of, dead on the field. Their retreat was made in excellent order, and they defeated a body of Venetians who had joined Francis, and ventured to oppose them. The old marshal Trivulzi, who had seen more service than any general of his time, used to say, that all the preceding engagements he had been in were but the play of boys, but that of Marignan was a battle of giants. Francis Sforza, duke of Milan, whom the Swiss protected, was made a prisoner, but gently treated by the king, who allowed him to enjoy his liberty, and a pension in France.

The battle of Marignan inspired all parties with moderation, though it put Francis in possession of the Milanese, almost without resistance. Sforza seemed to be happy in his captivity, having been long a slave to the Germans, the Swiss and the Spaniards. Francis made a triumphal entry into Milan, where he settled a civil government in imitation of that of France. He now gave law to Italy. He obliged Maximilian to restore Verona to the Venetians; he made a treaty with the pope, with whom he had an interview at Bologna, and who resigned into his hands Parma, and Placentia, upon Francis accepting of the Concordat, which was a mitigation of the Pragmatic Sanction; but Francis, at the same time, restored Urbino to the holy see. Upon his return from his conference with the pope, who offered to create him emperor of the East, he reviewed his army army at Milan, and finding that his victory at Marignano had cost him four thousand of his best troops, he resolved, if possible, to gain over the Swiss, and accordingly concluded a treaty with them, and made them his friends, by paying them six hundred thousand crowns. He then nominated the constable, Bourbon, to whose valour his victory at Marignano was chiefly owing, to be governor of Milan, and leaving with him a body of twelve thousand men, he returned to France, where he met with his queen and his mother at Lyons. His court there was excessively magnificent; but by that time, Maximilian, by the assistance and instigation of the pope, had taken twelve thousand Swiss into his pay, and invaded the Milanese, with so much fury, that the constable was on the point of abandoning that capital, where the French government was hated, when he was relieved by another body of twelve thousand Swiss, in the pay of Francis, who forced Maximilian to retire.

The constable recalled from his government of the Milanese.

The love which the dutchess of Angoulesme, (the first female of the royal blood of France, who was distinguished by the appellation of Madame) had for the constable Bourbon, was now converted into so rooted a hatred, that she prevailed with her son to recall him from his government, which was given to Odet de Foix, viscount of Lautrec, brother to Francis's mistress. Lautrec took Brescia, and gave it to the Venetians, but in the mean time, Ferdinand the Catholic died, which determined Francis to endeavour to recover Navarre for its king. By the death of Ferdinand, Charles of Austria, became heir to the crown of Spain, and the rival of Francis for the empire. Though he was then but sixteen years of age, he was provident, and sagacious, and he resolved, at all adventures, to make Francis his friend, before he departed for his new dominions. A treaty was accordingly entered into at Noyon, by which he engaged to marry Francis's daughter, who was no more than twelve months old; to pay Francis a hundred thousand crowns a year till the marriage was consummated, and to satisfy all the king of Navarre's demands in six months time. This treaty was so advantageous to Francis, that he himself did not expect the performance of it; but the affairs of Charles, in Spain, were at this time, so perplexed, that he would have even granted more advantageous terms to have secured the tranquility of the Low Countries, during his absence there. Maximilian acceded to this treaty, and upon Francis advancing him two hundred thousand crowns, and remitting to him a debt of three hundred thousand more lent him by Lewis XII. he promised Francis the investiture of the Milanese. Francis agreed to all those terms, the more readily, as Maximilian was now aged and infirm, so that a vacancy in the empire was every day expected.

Francis

With this view he had expended immense sums in bribing the German electors, and in bringing five cantons of the Swiss pope.

Swiss, who still stood out against him, into his interest. He thought nothing too much to preserve the friendship of the pope, who hated him; and he maintained the Concordat against the universal consent of his people and parliament, as being a violation of the Pragmatic Sanction, and the rights of the Gallican Church. The material difference between that Concordat and the Pragmatic Sanction, consisted in the pope's not being obliged by the former, as he was by the latter, to call a general council in a limited time; neither did the Concordat declare the general council to be superior to the pope. By the Concordat, the king was to nominate, under certain restrictions, to all benefices, in his kingdom; but he was to remit to Rome the annates, or twelve months revenue of each benefice. Francis had this measure greatly at heart; but he was opposed with vast firmness by the clergy, who refused to ratify the Concordat when it was presented to them, and affirmed, that they neither could nor would do any thing in an affair that affected the most valuable interest of the Gallican Church; demanding, at the same time, that an assembly of the clergy should be called. The chancellor was blamed for those violent proceedings, which Francis carried on in the most arbitrary manner; but in the mean time, the dispute was partly suspended by the birth of a dauphin, which overwhelmed the people and court of France with joy. Francis never lost sight of his Italian claims, in which he was encouraged by the pope, who ordered his kinsman, Lorenzo de Medici, to whom Francis had given the duchy of Urbino, to answer at the font for the young dauphin.

Upon the whole, it may be justly said, that Francis madly Conduct sacrificed to the pope the material interests of his kingdom, of Francis in order to purchase his friendship; so much was he set on the success of his attempt to conquer Naples and Milan. He gave to Lorenzo de Medici, Magdalen of Boulogne, one of the richest heiresses in France in marriage. He courted Wolsey, the English minister, in the most abject manner, with the same view, and entered with him upon a negotiation for the restitution of the bishopric of Tournay, which Wolsey still possessed. As Francis was resolved, at all events, to recover that city, and see, and to replace in it its old bishop, who was his subject, he paid Wolsey a large sum, and settled upon him an annuity of fourteen thousand livres a year.

Lautrec continued, at this time, governor of Milan under Francis; but being an interested man, he not only lost the affections of the people there to his master, but prepossessed himself so much against Trivulzi, that the gallant old general, when he was past eighty years of age, died of heart-break. The death of Maximilian, which happened about this time, broke all the cobweb engagements that subsisted between Francis and Charles. The former had Vol. IX.

expended immense sums to be chosen emperor; but, notwithstanding all his profusion of favours to the see of Rome, he was secretly opposed by the pope.

Whatever encomiums French writers have bestowed upon Francis, it is certain that, in the great measures both of government and war, he acted like a weak prince. He distributed among the electors of the empire above four hundred thousand crowns, without being able to secure a single vote, except that of Treves. He sacrificed to the pope the liberties of the Gallican Church, without receiving the least return, but that of treachery and ingratitude. He gave himself up to flatterers, who betrayed him; and he discovered no judgment in the choice he made of his ministers. At the same time, it cannot be denied that Francis was naturally possessed of good qualities; but all of them were useless to his subjects, excepting his patronage of the fine arts, which were, however, far from compensating for the miseries which his dissipated conduct brought upon his people.

emperor.

The arbitrary manner in which Francis conducted himself towards his clergy, and his nobility, operated strongly to his prejudice with the electors of the empire. They dreaded their being degraded into French noblemen, if he should succeed in his competition, and therefore they chose Charles. This preference created a rooted hatred between Charles and Francis, and each of them endeavoured to make Henry VIII. of England his friend. Francis continued his profusion to gain Wolsey, and he agreed that the dauphin (though it is doubtful if he was then born) should espouse Henry's daughter, the princess Mary. Those ridiculous marriages were, the state tricks of that time, and only made use of as expedients for temporary purposes. Henry sent over the earl of Worcester and the bishop of Ely, that he might be certified whether a dauphin was then in being, and they were, ordered if an infant in that character was presented to them, to satisfy themselves as to its virility.

The ties of friendship between Francis and Henry, were confirmed by the disappointment of the former in his views upon the empire, to which neither Henry nor his minister were friends. Wolsey, on this occasion, acted with prodigious art and address. He was courted equally by Francis and the emperor, who settled upon him an additional pension, and secretly gave him hopes of succeeding to the popedom. This was the true reason why Wolsey persuaded his master to have an interview with both those princes; that with Francis was within the lordship of Guisnes, Henry's own territory, and held under a tent of cloth of gold. It was as useless as magnificent. Henry stood godfather to the young born dauphin; but Charles fixed Henry in his interest, at an interview, which they had at Dover, previous to that of Guisnes.

Wolsey,

Wolsey, notwithstanding all his dissimulation, could not interview Francis that he was in the interest of Charles, Between and he endeavoured to gain Henry over without the interven- Francis tion of his minister. With this view, he broke thro' all the and Henry restraints of formality, and surprized Henry with a friendly VIII. visit at Guifnes. Henry appeared to be greatly touched with that mark of confidence; and it is very probable, that each monarch might have conceived a sincere friendship for the other, had it not been for the intrigues of their ministers.

The vast designs that Leo X. had formed for the aggran- Conne- dizement of his family, was favourable for the views of tions of Francis upon the crown of Naples. His holiness promised Francis to refuse Charles the investiture of that kingdom, and to with Leo give it to Francis, on condition: First, Of Gaeta, and a X. large territory on the frontiers of the ecclesiastical state being ceded to the holy see, or the Medici family: Secondly, That the rest of the kingdom of Naples should descend to Henry, the second son of Francis, and be governed, during his minority, by a cardinal legate: and Thirdly, That Francis should assist his holiness in reducing the rebel feudatories to the holy see. Francis having thus (as he thought) secured the pope in his interest, prepared for a breach with Charles, who, in his turn, had great complaints. He pretended that Francis was little better than the usurper of the Milanese, because he had not yet received the investiture of it from him, as emperor; that he detained the dutchy of Burgundy, which was his birth-right, and that all his obligations by the treaty of Noyon were void, as having been extorted from him by necessity. Francis answered those complaints, by the immense preparations he made for regaining Navarre from Charles. For that purpose, he sent an army into that His wars country under Andrew de Foix, baron of L'Esparre, who with the was brother to Lautrec, and at first, meeting with little or emperor. no opposition, he took Pampeluna, and might have secured Navarre for the d'Albret family, had he not, by inconsiderately besieging Legrognon, which belonged to the crown of Castile, united the nobility of that country against him, though they were then actually at war with Charles. They were headed by the admiral of Castile, and L'Esparre was obliged to raise the siege, and retire towards Pampeluna. A general engagement followed, in which L'Esparre was defeated, and taken prisoner; and it appeared from his papers, that Francis was resolved to come to extremities with Charles. The latter appealed to all the courts of Europe for this infidelity; for which Francis apologized, because the other had refused to execute the treaty of Noyon.

Navarre was not the only quarter in which Francis attacked the emperor. Robert de la Marc, duke of Bouillon, being nearly related to the prince of Chimay, took part with that prince's children in a pecuniary dispute they had with the sieur d'Ameries, who was favoured by the emperor. La Marc attached himself to Francis, though both he and his brother, the bishop of Liege, had been before violently in the interest of Charles. Francis lent la Marc money, with which he raised an army, declared war against Charles, and attacked his dutchy of Luxembourg. Both parties appealed to Henry VIII. of England, and it was agreed that he should have an interview with Francis at Calais; but in the mean time, the war continued. The seeming intimacy between Francis and Charles gave offence to the pope, who called upon Francis for the performances of his secret treaty for driving the imperialists out of Italy. The haughty pontiff gave Francis only twenty-two days for returning a categorical answer, and they elapsed without his receiving any; upon which his holiness granted the investiture of Naples to Charles.

The operations in the Low Countries were carried on, on the part of the emperor, by the count of Nassau, who was obliged to raise the siege of Meziers, which was defended by the chevalier Bayard. Each party at war endeavoured to cover the rooted hatred they had for the other by plausible pretexts, which can give very little information to the reader, while all of them pretended to submit their differences to Wolsey, who certainly was in the imperial interest, and had, in a manner, issued his mandate for both parties to appear before him, as their umpire, at Calais.

While this negotiation was on foot, and while Wolsey had drawn up a very practicable scheme of reconciliation, the French troops took Hesdin, and Francis at the head of his army, passed the Schelde in order to fight that of the emperor, who was encamped before Valenciennes. Had not Francis been blinded, at this time, by his mother, as she was by her hatred of the constable Bourbon, the campaign might have been decisive in favour of the French. The imperialists retired, and the French admiral Bonivet had taken Fontarabia in Spain. The constable advised Francis to improve the retreat of the emperor, by giving him, if possible, a total defeat; but the dutchess of Angoulême succeeded in persuading her son to give the command of his vanguard to the duke of Alençon, and the pursuit was discontinued, so that the imperialists besieged and took Tournay. Francis was equally unsuccessful in other quarters. Bonivet, instead of demolishing Fontarabia, as he ought to have done, preserved it, and thereby laid the foundation of a lasting war with Spain; while the pope openly took part with the imperialists, in the Milanese, and restored Francis Sforza to that dutchy. This revolution might have been prevented, had it not been for the boundless extravagance of Francis, and the rapacity of his mother, which disabled Lautrec from retaining the Swiss in the pay of France.

In

In 1521, Francis finding that the English king and mi- Henry nisters were entirely in the imperial interest, strengthened VIII. in himself by renewing his treaties with Scotland, which was the im-soon followed by a declaration of war against him, by perial in-Henry. The pretexts were, Francis having assisted de la terest.
Marc, and invading Castile, with various other complaints;
which are easily invented by princes who are resolved to quarrel with each other. The death of pope Leo X. at a time when the French interest was almost extinguished in Italy, had great effects on the affairs of Europe. The emperor favoured the election of his tutor, Adrian, who was raised to the popedom; to the great disappointment of Wolsey.

Francis had now seen his mistake, in dissipating the money which ought to have supported Lautrec in Italy.
The new pope declared against him; but he engaged in his service a body of Swiss mercenaries, who obliged Prosper Colonna, the general of the imperial and papal army, to entrench himself at Bicoque. Lautrec, was so much superior to Colonna, that the latter, in a few days, must have been obliged to surrender at discretion, had not the intractable humour of the Swiss forced Lautrec to attack Colonna in his entrenchments, by which he suffered a defeat, and was obliged to take shelter in the territories of Venice. He complained of his not being supported with money, which occasioned the defection of the Swiss; and de Baune Sem- blansai, the king's financier, was charged with being the Semblan- author of the disappointment. Semblansai, a venerable old sai the man, defended himself, by offering to produce the king's financier mother's receipts for the money that had been appropriat- executed.
ed for the pay of the Swiss; but they had been secreted by his deputy, Gentil, who was in the interest of the dutchess, and Semblansai not being able to produce them, was executed as a traitor, while Gentil was promoted to be president of the parliament.

In 1522, the earl of Surrey, who was lord high admiral War be- of England, burnt Morlaix, and destroyed seventeen sail of tween French ships on the coast of Normandy. He afterwards France landed sixteen thousand men at Calais, and in conjunction and Eng- with the imperial general, the count de Bures, he took land.
Hesdin, and Dourlens. About the same time, Henry VIII. received into his pay six thousand imperialists, who were commanded by Ferome Adorno, and retook Cremona and Genoa.
So many misfortunes distressed Francis for money; and, by the advice of his famous minister, du Prat, he had recourse to the most unwarrantable means for raising it. He had for his enemies, the emperor, the king of England, the pope, the dukes of Austria, and Milan, and the republics of Venice, Florence, and Genoa; and an event which happened at this time, contributed to encrease his misfortunes.

The constable Bourbon
deserts from
Francis,

Upon the death of the dutchess of Bourbon, wife to the constable, in 1521, the dutchess of Angoulême's affection for his person revived so strongly, that she engaged the king, her son, to prevail with the constable to marry her. The constable treated the proposal with a haughtiness that disgusted the king, and exasperated his mother beyond all measure. She was then about the age of forty-five, but he was no more than thirty-two; and his aversion for her person drove her into a scheme for his total ruin; for with the consent of her son, she brought a law suit against him for all his estate, which was the largest of any subject in France. By the powerful interest of the dutchess, the lands were sequestrated, and the constable thought himself so ill-treated, that he immediately entered into private connections with the emperor, who offered him in marriage his sister, the queen dowager of Portugal, with a fortune of two hundred thousand crowns, and to revive the antient kingdom of Arles, which he was to possess, besides conferring upon him many other extravagant marks of favour.

Francis, by the constable's withdrawing himself from court when the law suit went against him, suspected that he corresponded with the emperor, and surprizing him at Moulins, he fairly laid before him his suspicions, but at the same time, he did not dissemble that he had had provocation. The constable was at no pains to deny the charge; and the king, with a frankness peculiar to himself, offered to forget all that had passed, and restore him to his estate. The constable appeared to be touched with his generosity, and promised obedience; but took the first opportunity of escaping to Spain, which he effected with great difficulty.

After the constable was out of the power of Francis, both the emperor, and Henry VIII. affected to treat him as a sovereign prince, and admitted him as a party into their alliance. He was the favourite of the French nobility and people. His resentments were equal to the greatness of his spirit, and were carried to a height which his provocations, excessive as they were, could not justify. Some pretend that he agreed to recognize Henry, as his lawful sovereign, and to assist him in conquering France. At the time of the constable's defection, Francis had an army on foot for invading Italy; but, as an insurrection in France was apprehended, its march was countermanded; while the English insulted the coasts of France with their fleet, and the French lost the few places which still remained to them in Italy. Charles continued to pay Wolsey his appointments, and marched an army through the Franche Compté into Burgundy, while, on the twenty-fourth of August 1523, an English army under the duke of Suffolk landed at Calais, and on the twenty-fourth of December following he was joined by the count de Bures, the imperial general. Their army then amounted to about thirty thousand men, with which they took Montdidier, Bray sur Somme, and other places, notwith-

notwithstanding all the efforts of Trimouille, the French general, to oppose them; and, rigorous as the season was, they advanced within eleven leagues of Paris. It is to the praise of the French, that on this occasion they laid aside all their animosities, and united against their common enemies. The count of Vendosme commanded one army, and Trimouille another; and the little care which Charles had taken for the payment of his troops rendered the farther progress of the confederates impracticable; so that the count de Bures withdrew towards Valenciennes, and the English to Calais.

The count de Guise, about the same time, had checked War in the imperial army that had been sent into Burgundy; but Italy continued had Charles persisted with the same vigour that Henry discovered, the French monarchy must at this time have received an irretrievable blow. The constable Bourbon, after his escape out of France, fled to Italy, where the emperor declared him his lieutenant-general, but took very little care to support him. Francis not daring to leave his kingdom, had given the management of his Italian war to his admiral, Bonivet, who took Novara, and made some attempts upon Cremona and Milan; but though he had the chevalier Bayard to command under him, he was baffled in all his undertakings, and obliged to take winter quarters in Piedmont. The emperor had, in person, headed his troops in Navarre, and after making a feint of besieging Fontarabia, he suddenly invested Bayonne; but, through the valour of Lautrec, who threw himself into the place, he was obliged to raise the siege. Thus Francis, by the loyalty and abilities of his generals, was delivered from three threatening invasions, by powerful enemies.

All this while, Wolsey, upon whom the affairs of Europe to the advantage then hinged, was kept in tolerable temper, by the hopes of the of his succeeding pope Adrian, who was very old; but of the upon his death, the cardinal de Medici, who took the name French of Clement VII. was chosen, to Wolsey's great disappointment. Matters began then to wear a favourable aspect for Francis. The admiral, Bonivet, being joined by fifteen thousand Swiss, re-entered Italy, recovered Cremona, and again got a footing in the Milaneze; but little care was taken at the court of Francis to support him; and, after losing the brave chevalier de Bayard, he was obliged to repass the mountains. The crown of England furnished the money for all those operations against Francis; but the chief dependence of his enemies, now, rested on the constable Bourbon. Charles had treated him with no great consideration, and, after he had put him at the head of an army, he obliged him to besiege Marseilles, instead of marching to Lyons, where he was sure of being joined by the friends and dependents of his family. After reducing Aix, Toulon, and other places, he sat down before that city, about the middle of August, but after besieging it forty days, he was, through

Francis through the jealousy of the Spanish general, Pescara, obliged to abandon his enterprize. Francis was then at the head of an army, which cut off great numbers of the imperialists and Germans, in their retreat into Italy. The marshals Chabannes and Montmorenci commanded under him, and they recovered all the places that had been taken by the constable.

This was a glorious æra in the reign of Francis, as it not only discovered his own martial abilities, but the affection which his subjects had for his person, and how vain the expectations of the constable were of raising a revolt in his dominions. He was too much intoxicated with success, and understanding that his enemies were directing their march towards the Milanese, he proposed, in a council of war, either to follow them or be beforehand with them. He was encouraged to this by the intelligence he had of a coldness having arisen between Henry VIII. and the emperor, which delivered him from all apprehensions on the side of Picardy. The proposal, though great objections lay against it, was agreed to. Money, however, was wanting to carry it into execution, and Francis was obliged not only to sell the places belonging to the law to the best bidders, but to coin a large grate of massy silver, weighing nigh seven thousand marks, with which Lewis XI. had surrounded the tomb of St. Martin, at Tours. Those, and other mean expedients, shew the vast distress which Francis was then in for executing his views, which reached not only to the Milanese, but to Naples; for he gave the command of an army to the duke of Albany, to penetrate into that kingdom.

and follows the imperialists into Italy.

It happened favourably for Francis, that about this time, not only Henry VIII. but the pope, was jealous of Charles, and he endeavoured to negotiate an accommodation between France and England. Francis, with his army, which consisted of near fifty thousand men, passed the Alps at Mount Cennis, having constituted his mother, once more, regent of his kingdom during his absence. She had opposed his expedition into Italy, but he was overpersuaded by admiral Bonivet to undertake it, and he avoided her sight, that he might rid himself of her importunities. Every thing favoured his expedition. The imperial army was diminished by fatigue and desertions. Milan had been visited by a plague, and she opened her gates to receive him. The remains of the imperialists, and Sforza's troops, had retired to Lodi; but Francis, instead of pursuing them, formed the siege of Pavia, a very strong city, and defended by a numerous garrison under the famous Antonio de Leva, one of the ablest generals in Europe. The constable Bourbon was then raising soldiers in Germany; and about the time that Francis besieged Pavia, he arrived in Italy, with twelve thousand foot, as did Pescaro, and Lanoy, with fresh reinforcements from from Spain and Naples. Francis thought that nothing was impossible for his army and generals to effect, and he pressed the siege of Pavia with prodigious vigour.

The fortune of Francis was now at a stand. The duke of Albany was on his march to Naples, and he detached the marquis of Saluces, with a strong body, to make war on the side of Genoa; so that the main body of his army was inferior to that of the imperialists. The vigilance and courage of de Leva baffled all his efforts against Pavia; but Francis was in hopes that his German garrison would mutiny for want of pay; which they certainly were on the point of doing, when the constable Bourbon, Lanoy, and Pescara, came to a resolution of risking every thing by giving battle to Francis. He might, had he followed the pope's advice, and that of his ablest generals, have still avoided the fate that attended him, by raising the siege of Pavia, and remaining upon the defensive, as the imperial generals in the field, as well as in that city, expected every day to be deserted, if not imprisoned, by their German mercenaries. Francis listened only to his own humour and his admiral Bonivet, who undertook for the success of the siege of Pavia; but he ordered all the troops he had in the Milanese within his lines, that he might supply the place of the Grisons in his army, who were called to the defence of their own country.

The imperial generals found no time was to be lost, and but is resolved to attack his camp, which lay in a park. This beaten, they did on the twenty-fourth of February, 1524. The duke and taken of Alençon then commanded the rear-guard of the French, prisoner, and stood the first charge of the imperialists. Francis marched before to support him; and his artillery was so well supplied, that Pavia. the Spanish infantry was repulsed. In the heat of the pursuit, he struck into a hollow-way; by which he put himself between the fire of his own batteries and that of his enemies; and, being vigorously charged in the flank by Lanoy, the viceroy of Naples, his Swiss infantry gave way in their turn; and, the French cavalry being inferior to the Spanish in goodness, Francis found himself, in a manner, surrounded. He behaved, however, with matchless intrepidity, and killed five of his enemies with his own hand. The duke of Lorraine's brother, Richard de la Pole, of the blood-royal of England, the masters of his horse and household, admiral Bonivet, and his great general, Trimouille, fell by his side, almost all of them at the same instant, besides many other persons of rank and distinction. He was, at last, beaten from his horse; and, recovering himself, he killed two more of his enemies; but finding all farther resistance in vain, he surrendered himself prisoner to Lanoy.

The French lost about ten thousand of their best troops in this action. The king of Navarre, and many of the nobility, were taken prisoners; but Francis was conducted to the fortress of Pizzighitone, from whence he wrote the following billet to his mother: "Madam, we have lost all, our honour excepted."

Great

danger of France,

of Ven-
dosme.

The destruction of France seemed then to be inevitable. The Flemings and the English were ready to invade her, and her government was not only without troops, but divided in itself; a party having been formed for dispossessing the dutchess of the regency, and giving it to the duke of Vendosme, who was then the head of the Bourbon family in France. That prince had the magnanimity to forget all resentment for the usage which he and his kinsman, the constable, had received; and repairing to Lyons, he assured her of his attachment to her authority. A new council was then established; but the deliverance of France from her impending calamities, was owing to the sudden turn which the politics of Henry and his minister took. They called upon Charles to execute the engagements he was under to acknowledge Henry as king of France, and to assist him in conquering Normandy and Aquitain. Charles had never been in earnest when he contracted those treaties; and he was so little disposed to fulfil them, that, though he had been betrothed to Henry's daughter, he married the king of Portugal's sister.

treaty with England.

This, and other provocations he met with from Charles, determined Henry to embrace the cause of Francis; and he concluded a treaty with the regent, who engaged herself, in her son's name, to pay him two millions of crowns of gold; the princes of the blood, and the chief nobility, and cities of France, being sureties for the performance. This treaty was signed on the thirtieth of August, and Henry undertook to do all he could for the deliverance of Francis, and to balance the now over-grown power of the emperor. His friendship gave some stability to the French government. The duke of Lorraine defeated the Flemings and Germans; and the French gallies, under Andrew Doria, brought back the remains of the French army from Italy.

Francis remained, all this while, at Pizzighitone. He had been visited by the imperial generals, who had treated him with great deference; and the marquis of Pescara appeared before him in mourning, for which the king behaved to him with the utmost politeness and marks of friendship. It was with some difficulty that Francis admitted the constable, duke of Bourbon, into his presence; but, when the first impressions of his grief began to wear off, he found himself under a necessity of dissembling; and it is said that he forgave him, and behaved to him with familiarity.

Francis

treats for his liberty.

Being impatient of his restraint, he proposed terms to Charles; and offered to renounce his claims upon Naples and Milan, and his superiority over Artois and Flanders. He offered to assist Charles in making good all the pretensions he had in Italy, and to marry his sister, the queen-dowager of Portugal (he himself being now a widower) and to receive with her the dutchy of Burgundy as her dowry ; which was to descend to the children of the marriage. Charles, though he dissembled his dissatisfaction, began now to abate of that reserve and politeness which he had always affected before, and he soon made Francis sensible that he knew how to make use of his good fortune. He rejected the proposed terms with contempt, and sent Adrian de Croy into Italy to treat with Francis. The terms he demanded were, that Francis should simply renounce all his pretensions upon the dukedom of Burgundy, Flanders, and Artois ; that he should dismember Dauphiny, Provence, and the Lyonnois, from his crown ; and erect them into a kingdom for the duke of Bourbon, who was to hold it without any homage ; and that Henry VIII. of England should be satisfied. The very proposal of those terms struck Francis with such a fit of despair, that it was with difficulty his attendants prevented his doing violence to his own person. Becoming more moderate, he declared that he would die, in the vilest prison in Italy, rather than consent to the dismemberment of his dominions.

The viceroy, Lanoy, had, by this time, discovered that Vol. X. very deep intrigues were on foot, among the Italian princes, p. 247. for delivering Francis, and for reducing the power of Charles in Italy ; and that nothing but the pope's fears could prevent their being carried into execution.

Lanoy was a man of great address, and managed his business with Francis so artfully, that the latter, in a manner, requested to be carried to Spain ; which he accordingly was, and lodged in the castle of Madrid, under the care of his keeper Alarcon. He had, during his voyage, flattered himself with the thoughts of making an impression upon the magnanimity of Charles ; and in this imagination he was soothed by the high distinctions paid him by all who approached him in his journey from Palamos, where he landed, through Valentia to Madrid. He was miserably disappointed in his expectations. He found himself more closely confined than ever ; and, when he demanded a conference with the emperor, he was told, he was not to expect that till the preliminaries of the accommodation between them were settled. He was visited by his favourite sister, the dutchess of Alençon, one of the most beautiful, but intriguing, women of her age. Vexation and disappointment, however, had, by this time, thrown him into a fever ; and Charles was distracted how to behave between the factions which the dutchess had formed in his court, and the fear of losing all the advantages of his royal prisoner's captivity. Francis being somewhat recovered, at the suggestion of his sister, he gave her a commission, before his keepers and the grandees who attended him, to return to France, with orders, that his son should be proclaimed king in his stead, and that he himself should be considered as being out of the world.

The

The intelligence sent to Charles by his general, the marquis of Pescara, to whom the Italian princes had offered the sovereignty of Naples, determined his conduct. He afterwards found that the artful management of the dutchess of Alençon had projected that revolt.

where he is visited by Charles Charles, to lose no time, finished a progress he was making in Spain; and hurried back to Madrid, where he paid a visit to Francis. There was nothing very particular in their first interview, only, when Francis called himself the slave and prisoner of Charles, the latter affected to sooth him, by telling him, he was a free prince, his good friend, and brother. Nothing more passed, and Charles renewed his visit next day; but so little to the satisfaction of Francis, that his fever encreased; and his sister covering his face with a handkerchief, laid him out for dead, after he had received extreme unction. The skill of the physicians, and the strength of his constitution, recovered him; and the dutchess followed Charles to Toledo, if possible, to finish the negotiation, which now turned upon the unwillingness of Francis to part with Burgundy. She was unsuccessful in her attempt, and in a plot she had formed for the escape of Francis. The negotiation, however, was resumed, and Francis appeared to be more tractable on the head of Burgundy; though, in truth, he had now resolved to have no regard to any treaty he should conclude with Charles; but his impatience to be at liberty, got the better of all other considerations. After a variety of treating, the duke of Bourbon arrived in Spain, and the dutchess of Alençon took her leave of Charles; who was now so thoroughly convinced of her intrigues, that he gave orders for her being arrested the next day; but she escaped by the dispatch she made in her return to France.

and freed by the treaty of Madrid, On the fourteenth of January, 1525, the treaty between Charles and Francis was signed at Madrid; and it has been generally allowed that Charles was overseen in his policy, by extorting such unconscionable terms as he did from his prisoner. Francis was to marry Eleonora, queen-dowager of Portugal, eldest sister to Charles; and to have with her two hundred thousand crowns. He was to give up his two sons as hostages, and to renounce all his claims of superiority over the dutchy of Burgundy, the counties of Flanders and Artois, the kingdom of Naples, the dutchy of Milan, and various places of great importance in the Low Countries. He was to abandon the interest of the king of Navarre; to reinstate the duke of Bourbon, and his followers, in their estates and honours, as well as the prince of Orange and the marquis of Saluces. He was to assist the emperor in his claims upon Gueldres, and to lend him a fleet and an army when he undertook any Italian expedition; and, if he failed in the performance of any of those stipulations, he was, upon the faith and honour of a prince, to return to his captivity in Spain.

It seems pretty plain, that Charles suspected the intention of Francis to disregard the material parts of this treaty. His imprisonment was continued after it was signed ; and, tho' Charles carried him to pay a visit to his future spouse, he could not be prevailed on to grant him his liberty. At last, after putting him under the strongest promises of fulfilling the treaty, he suffered him to depart ; but not without the escort of Lanoy and Alarcon, who conducted him to the frontiers, where they exchanged his liberty for that of his two sons, who were carried hostages to Madrid.

When Francis set his foot on his own dominions, he found Lautrec waiting for him with a fleet Turkish horse ; which he mounted, and galloped away towards St. Jean de Luz, calling out by the way, That he was once more a king. When he arrived at Bayonne, he found his mother and court waiting for him ; and he was received as if he had returned from a victory instead of a captivity.

Lanoy, and Alarcon, after resigning the royal hostages to which he the constable of Castile's son, attended Francis at Paris ; refuses to where they demanded the ratification and execution of the execute. treaty of Madrid. Francis made little difficulty in acquainting them that he did not think it binding, and that he could not make the cessions contained in it without consent of the states of his kingdom ; but he offered to pay two millions of crowns for the liberty of his sons and the other hostages. This refusal introduced a variety of recriminations between Francis and Charles, who accused each other of cruelty and perfidy. The states of Burgundy complained to Francis, that he had done what he had no power to do, in dismembering them from his crown. The Spanish ministers treated this complaint as an evasion, and required Francis to imitate his predecessor, king John, by returning to his captivity. He answered, with great spirit, that John was prisoner to a prince who knew how to treat him as a king ; but that the treatment he had received at Madrid was infamous. Francis was the more bold, as he had now concluded with the Italian princes what they called the ibid. holy league, of which Henry VIII. declared himself protector, for reducing the imperial power in Italy. Still some tenderness remained in the breast of Francis for his children, and this made him delay the march of his troops into Italy ; by which the ends of the league were defeated. We have al- Vol. IX. ready given an account of the sack of Rome, with the other p. 103. consequences of the league. It is sufficient here to observe, Vol. X. that, in August, 1526, Francis, having renewed his engage- p. 248. ments with England, sent a numerous army, under Lautrec, into the Milanese ; the greatest part of which he recovered, and restored, according to the terms in the holy league, to the Sforza family.

greatest excesses, in revenge of the defeat they had suffered before that city. He then passed the Po, and forced the duke of Ferrara and the marquis of Mantua to abandon the imperial party, and embrace that of the confederates. Francis, about this time, had given his sister, the dutchess of Alençon, in marriage to Henry II. king of Navarre; and the county of Guic was erected into a dukedom, in favour of Claude, brother to the duke of Lorrain.

Francis made it a great point to approve himself, in the eyes of his contemporaries, a man of honour in regard to the emperor. Before he came to hostilities, he called an assembly of his great men, or, as they are called, his notables, and gravely required their opinion, whether he was bound to the performance of the treaty of Madrid, or to return to his captivity in Spain. Their answer was in the negative as to both points, for reasons that will readily suggest themselves to the readers; but they agreed to assist him in discharging his pecuniary obligations, and to raise the money he had offered for the ransom of his sons. Francis dispatched a herald with this answer to Spain, and with orders to denounce war, if Charles should refuse to accept of the money. The herald was treated with great indignity for his master's sake, and mutual challenges passed between Charles and Francis, to decide their quarrel in single combat. Those altercations have been justly treated as being ridiculous in two great princes; but the prosperity of Francis now received some new checks. His general, Lautrec, had penetrated into the kingdom of Naples, great part of which he reduced, and he blocked up the capital.

Vol. X.
p. 250.

During the time of this blockade, an epidemical distemper swept off all the French army, excepting about four thousand men, and Lautrec died among the rest. He had complained of being badly supported by the Venetians, and his other allies; and his successor, the marquis of Saluces, was obliged to break up the blockade, and to retire to Aversa; where he surrendered himself, and the miserable remains of his army, to the prince of Orange, who was now the imperial viceroy in Naples; so that the French once more lost all footing in that kingdom; though the French admiral, Doria, had defeated and killed Moncado, the imperial admiral, by sea.

Revolution of Genoa.

But the great blow which Francis, at this time, received in Italy, was the defection of that famous admiral from his service. Though he had laid Francis under the most sensible obligations, by the victories he had acquired, he could not, without grief, see the French masters of his native country, Genoa. He offered Francis the sum of two hundred thousand crowns, if he would restore the Genoese to their liberty and put them in possession of the port of Savona. Francis had made a present of the customs of Savona to Anne de Montmorenci, who was now his chief favourite; and chancellor du Prat represented the conduct of Doria, who had been

been long endeavouring to rouse his countrymen to a sense of their condition, as factious and discreditable. Francis, upon this, gave orders that Doria should be deprived of the command of his gallies, which was given to one Barbesienos; but Doria entered with his own gallies into the service of the emperor, and, in a short time, drove the French out of Genoa, and put the Genoese in possession of Savona. Trivulzi, who commanded the French garrison there, threw himself into the citadel, but was obliged to capitulate.

This event diminished the reputation of the French arms, especially as they were defeated in all their attempts to regain possession of Genoa. The count of St. Paul had obtained some advantages in the Milanese. The truth is, that Francis acted with great duplicity towards his allies, whom he strove to render subservient to his own views for peace. But the French, on the twenty-second of June, under the command of the count of St. Paul, were entirely defeated in the battle of Landriano, in the Milanese.

By this time, a treaty had been set on foot between the princess Margaret, of Savoy, governess of the Low Countries, and the dutchess of Angoulesme, at Cambray, for a general pacification. This negotiation was entirely carried on by the ladies, and ended in a treaty; by which Charles accepted of two millions of ducats for his claim upon Burgundy. Francis engaged to pay four hundred thousand crowns, as a debt due from the emperor to the king of England; and to redeem a rich jewel, which had been pawned to the crown of England, for fifty thousand crowns. He was, likewise, to give up to Charles the town and castle of Hesdin; to renounce his superiority over Flanders and Artois, and all his claims in Italy; but, in return, his children, and the other hostages, were to regain their liberty.

The peace
bray.

When we consider the connections between Francis and his allies, we must conclude this peace to have been scandalous: but he had nothing to apprehend from any of them except Henry VIII. and he soon fell upon a way to soften him. Henry was then prosecuting the famous affair of his divorce; and Francis secretly engaged, that his French universities, which were then famous for learned men, should favour it. Wolfey had been some time in France, for that purpose; and Francis sent over, by Montmorenci, the order of St. Michael to Henry; who, in return, sent him an acquittance of all the debts due to him from the emperor, amounting to six hundred thousand crowns.

Francis, who was a most unsteady, irresolute prince, privately protested against the validity of this treaty; but it was ratified in parliament; and the great moderation of Charles, thereof, which was owing to the progress of the Turks in Hungary and Germany, saved his Italian states from ruin. Florence submitted to the family of Medici; the Venetians purchased their their peace by resigning the conquests they had made on the Neapolitan coasts; and even Sforza received the investiture of the Milanese, though he was more obnoxious than any of the other allies to Charles.

Francis
encou-
learning.

Nothing now remained but for Francis to pay the money he had promised to Charles, and to send for his bride, the queen-dowager of Portugal, together with his sons and the other hostages. Montmorenci was trusted with those commissions. The children were delivered; Francis married his bride, and made a public entry with her into Bordeaux; he then applied himself to cultivate the arts of peace, which were the more endeared to him by the storms through which he had passed. He had received, when young, a strong tincture of learning; but never had any opportunities of improving it, though he still retained a general notion of the polite arts. France, at that time, contained many men of great parts and merit, whom Francis employed in the improvement of his mind. Bude, so well known by his Latin name, Budæus, was an excellent lawyer, civilian, and Greek scholar; Bellay, the bishop of Paris, who was afterwards promoted to the purple; and Chastel, bishop of Macon, excelled in different branches of literature. These were the men whom the king depended upon for instruction. Being sensible of his own defects, his method was, to prescribe to each of them a theme, which they methodized in a clear, classical manner, and read to him at his meals, and at the times he had most leisure to attend them. His librarian and linguist was Lascais, a noble Greek, who furnished him with a variety of curious manuscripts, and presided over a library and printing-house, both which he erected; as he did professional chairs, for the study of Hebrew and Greek, under the inspection of Francis Vatalbe and Peter Danes. Had he not been dissuaded from it by du Prat, who terrified him by the expences it would cost him, he would have founded a college for six hundred students; but, upon the whole, he well merited the appellation which he obtained, that of the father and restorer of learning in France. He enriched his court and country by the encouragement he gave to a number of excellent painters, and the celebrated Leonardo da Vinci is said to have died in his arms. In 1530, Francis appointed justiciary circuits all over his kingdom, to be held by judges who were authorized to remedy, in the last resort, the abuses which had crept in among his subjects during his absence and imprisonment.

Deaths of some great personages in France.

In September, that year, died the dutchess of Angoulesme, whose character has been differently represented by writers; but they all agree, that she acted with great address and judgment while regent of the kingdom; and that it was owing to her prudent conduct, her son's captivity was not attended with worse consequences than it was. About the same time time died Margaret of Austria, the same who had been so long bred up at the French court as the wife of Charles VII. and the disgrace of sending her back a virgin, sunk so deep into her mind, that she was the determined enemy of the French ever after. The same year was fatal to the duke of Milan; and Philibert de Chalons, prince of Orange, was killed at the siege of Florence, while he was forcing that republic to resume the yoke of the house of Medici.

The state of France being now somewhat settled, Francis pursued a project he had long secretly concerted with his chancellor du Prat, by incorporating Bretagne with the rest of his dominions. The Bretons, of all people in France were the most tenacious of their privileges; and when du Prat consulted Lewis de Deserts, the president of their parliament, about the union, he found it would be impracticable to be effected, unless the Bretons themselves should desire it.

To pave the way for this, the king visited Bretagne, Francis where he performed a thousand popular acts, which he reannexes was in hopes would dispose the people to comply with his Bretagne terms; but when their parliament met, and when a motion to his was made that they should petition to be united to the crown, crown of France, it was treated as a proposal for forging their own chains. The first fire of the opposition, however, being spent, the president treated with its heads separately; and by the application, partly of money, partly of reasoning, he brought them into his measure, but in such a manner, that the Bretons still enjoy more liberties and immunities than the people of any other French province. Francis, all this while lived upon good terms with Henry VIII. of England. He made a merit with the pope of having prevailed with Henry not to take the last step of separation from the see of Rome; but to say the truth, he imposed upon Henry, that he might secure his assistance in supporting the league of Smalcald, which was now formed by the protestants against the emperor, in order to renew his claim upon the Milanese. He had entered into a secret treaty with the pope for undoing all that had been done by the treaty of Cambray; for his son the duke of Orleans, was to be created duke of Milan, and to marry the pope's niece, afterwards the famous Catharine de Medici. Not contented with this measure, Francis entered into a correspondence with the Turks, whom he encouraged to invade the dominions of the house of Austria.

Charles on the other hand was not idle. He had formed a league among the Italian princes for opposing Francis in any future invasion of Italy. He had secured in his interest the duke of Savoy, by giving him the country of Asti, formerly belonging to the Orleans family; and by that prince's means he had formed a strong party among the Swiss and Grisons. The emperor having thus, as he thought, provided vided for the quiet of Italy, raised a great army against the Turks, which the protestants complained was to fall upon them. This drew the connections between them and Francis closer than ever, and Francis sent Bellay, as being the French minister who was most agreeable to Henry, to propose to that prince to support the league of Smalcald, and likewise his having an interview with the pope at Marseilles, in order to make up differences between Henry and his holiness.

Henry, accordingly advanced fifty thousand crowns to the princes of the Smalcaldian league, but he refused to agree to an interview, and even reproached Francis for the marriage treaty he had entered into with the pope. The event was, that Francis by encouraging the Turks to invade Germany equally alarmed the protestant princes as the emperor, and the latter accepting of the mediation of the archbishop of Mentz, accommodated his differences with the protestants by the treaty of Nurembourg, which was very advantageous for the protestants, and made a glorious campaign against the Turks in Hungary. He then in his turn proposed an interview with the pope, about holding a general council; and on this occasion a new treaty was concluded between Francis and Henry on the twenty-third of June. On this occasion, the bishop of Bayonne, the French ambassador in England, proposed an interview between the two kings, which Henry would not have accepted of, had it not been for the extreme complaisance of Francis towards the famous Anne Bullen, to whom he wrote a letter with his own hand. The interview, accordingly took place, with prodigious magnificence, and Francis pretended to be so violent a friend to Henry's divorce, and to his marriage with the lady, who was now created marchioness of Pembroke, that he won the hearts and confidence of both. His dissimulation even went so far as to gain Henry's consent to the proposed interview with his holiness; he promised not to kiss his toe, and not only to break off the marriage between his son and the princess de Medici, but even to abandon the religion of the church of Rome, if he did not give Henry satisfaction in the affair of the divorce. Francis being sensible of the public odium he had fallen under for inviting the Turks to invade Hungary, persuaded Henry to enter into a league with him, which they soon made public, for bringing next year, into the field, an army of seventy thousand infantry, and ten thousand cavalry, to be employed against the infidels. When the two courts parted, Henry presented Montmorenci, and Chabot, admiral of France, with the order of the garter.

Francis upon his return to Paris, sent the cardinals Tournon, and Grammont, to Rome, to keep the pope fixed in his interest. Soon after, the interview between his holiness, and the emperor took place; but though the latter was then the pope's master, yet his holiness hated him so much, much, that he neither could persuade him to break off the match between his niece and the duke of Orleans, nor to enter into a league with the other Italian powers for keeping the French out of Italy. The duke of Albany had already concerted with the pope every thing relating to the marriage, and, to the amazement of Henry himself, his holiness shewed some dispositions to grant him all he requested, and it was agreed that Henry should even be appointed to be present in their approaching interview at Marseilles. Francis intended that it should have been at Nice; but in this he was opposed by the duke of Savoy; and Langey, the French resident at Henry's court, proposed, if that prince could not be present at the interview, that he would send the duke of Norfolk thither, with some learned men, to assist in the conferences for reconciling Henry with his holiness. But affairs took a sudden turn at the court of Rome. The imperialists were so strong in the conclave, that they forced the pope upon violent measures against Henry, which exasperated that impetuous prince so greatly, that he called upon Francis to fulfil his engagements, by immediately shaking off the papal yoke.

Nothing could be more distant than this was from the Rise of thoughts of Francis, and the request, which was made by the English the mouth of the duke of Norfolk, startled him prodigiously. By this time, Henry had been married to Anne Bullen, who was pregnant, and he was so certain of being well supported by his people, and parliament, that he was no longer at any pains to manage the pope. Notwithstanding all those discouragements, Francis behaved with such address, by flattering the new queen's vanity, that he prevented a total breach with Henry. The interview of the pope and Francis, and the marriage of the princess de Medici with the duke of Orleans, took place at Marseilles. It was the real interest of Francis to effect a reconciliation between the pope and Henry; but this was not in the power even of the pope, who had been forced to agree to excommunicate Henry. Bellay, bishop of Paris, had prevailed with the latter, to delay for some days his total rupture with the court of Rome; and his holiness had, with great difficulty, been prevailed upon by Francis, not to publish the sentence of excommunication. According to French authors, Bellay acted with such indefatigable address, that the agreement of Henry to comply with the pope's demands, came only two days too late to prevent the publication of the excommunication; and to this happy delay England owed her reformation.

Gardiner, the English minister, had attended the interview at Marseilles, but he appeared to be so much in the Francis interest of the emperor, that Francis had desired Henry upon to recall him. Upon his return to London, he gave his Milan, master a very disadvantageous idea of the French king's sincerity; sincerity; but Francis was now far advanced in his preparations for his Italian expedition. The coldness of Henry was in a great measure ballanced by the engagements he entered into with the protestant princes of Germany. Charles pretended to support the Sforza house of Milan; and Francis sent a Milanese gentleman to negotiate with that duke, but without any public character, or at least, any that the duke chose he should avow, for fear of disobliging the emperor. Charles, however, suspected the negotiation, and forced the duke to deliver up all the papers sent to him from Francis by the agent, whose name was Marveille, who had the misfortune to kill, but in his own defence, a Milanese nobleman, with whom he had a quarrel; for which his head was struck off by Sforza's order, without any form of trial, to prevent his declaring his public character. Francis complained of this violation of the law of nations to Charles, and brought undoubted evidences of Marveille's having been received as an ambassador, by the duke of Milan. The emperor treated his complaints with contempt; and though the duke had offered an excuse for what had happened, yet Francis resolved to make it a handle for attacking the Milanese. He therefore, ordered his troops to rendezvous at Lyons; he renewed his engagements with the Ottoman Port, and the protestant princes of Germany, and declared war against the duke of Savoy, for refusing his army a passage through his dominions.

He burns
his protestant
subjects.

Francis, before he entered in person upon his expedition, resolved to give the new pope, Paul III. on whom he greatly depended for success in Italy, a most inhuman proof of his attachment to the church of Rome; for he ordered six of his Lutheran subjects to be burnt, with most exquisite circumstances of cruelty; and he declared that he would cut off his arm, if he thought his blood was tainted with heresy. We can scarcely believe that Francis, in his heart, was so despicable a prince as his actions proclaimed him to be. He had borne with his sister the queen of Navarre, who was known to be a Lutheran, and at her request he had agreed to hear Melancthon preach; but he now retracted his promise. While he was thus madly lighting up the flames of persecution in his own country, he was protecting the protestants in Germany, and interceding for the Roman catholics in England; so easily can ambition reconcile the most gross absurdities.

Death of pope Cle- ment VII.

The death of pope Clement VII. ought to have induced Francis to have laid aside his Italian expedition. That pontiff had a vast family interest in Italy, and besides the concern he took in the aggrandizement of the duke of Orleans and his wife, he was so determined an enemy to Charles, that he had privately encouraged Francis in all his connections with the German protestants, and the infidels. The death of Francis Sforza, duke of Milan, was another capital capital incident that happened about this time. Chabot, the French general and admiral, had reduced the greatest part of Savoy, and his success had encouraged the people of Geneva to expel their bishop, and to declare for the protestant religion. The Savoyards, in the mountains, however, made so good a resistance, that Francis was unable to penetrate into the Milanese during the year 1535.

The emperor Charles had now returned to Naples from a War be- glorious expedition he had made in Africa; but though he tween had an excellent fleet and an army on foot, he did not dare Francis to be the aggressor while Francis continued to be supported and by the German protestants. He went to Rome, where, in a Charles public consistory, he declaimed against him with the most in Savoy bitter invectives, and accused him of his connections with and Pied- the infidels, and of having forced him to leave his African mont. conquests unfinished to oppose his progress. At last, as usual, he challenged him to single combat. Charles did all this only to render Francis odious to the protestants as well as the papists; but he soon employed every expedient to amuse him. He proposed giving the investiture of the Milanese to his third son, the duke of Angoulesme; and this prevailed upon Francis to confine his operations to Savoy and Piedmont. Charles went farther, for he offered his kinswoman, the princess Mary of England, in marriage to the dauphin. By this time, Chabot had almost completed the conquest of Savoy and Piedmont, and had forced that duke, who could not prevail upon Charles to assist him, to shut himself up in Vercil; but Charles was now upon good terms with the protestants of the empire, and had collected his army, which was composed of the best troops he had ever brought into the field. His old general, de Leva, lay with an army in the neighbourhood of Vercil, which saved it from falling into Chabot's hands; and Francis was soon obliged, after throwing garrisons into Turin, Fossan, Coni, and several other places, to order his armies to evacuate Savoy and Piedmont. He declared the marquis of Saluces his lieutenant in Italy; but the French troops were no sooner returned to the defence of their own country, than he put Coni into the hands of the emperor. Montpesat, a French officer, defended Fossan for some time, and at last obtained a capitulation; but Claude d'Annebaut, who commanded in Turin, saved that city for Francis; and Charles was obliged to turn its siege into a blockade.

France was now in imminent danger. Charles had the best France generals in Europe; de Leva commanded immediately saved by under himself; the marquis del Vasto, was his general of marshal foot; Gonzaga commanded his light horse, and the duke Montmo- of Alva his gens d'armes: the whole of his army consisting renci. of fifty thousand veterans. It was now plain, that Francis, instead of madly pushing his conquests in Italy, would find it difficult to cover his own dominions. He gave the chief command of his army to the marshal Montmorenci, who was to secure Provence, and Dauphiny; and to take up a strong camp in the neighbourhood of Avignon, but by no means to hazard a battle. Montmorenci executed his orders to admiration. He rendered the country through which the imperial army was to march, a desert; so that Charles had the utmost difficulty to procure subsistence for his army. He advanced, however, under all discouragements, in hopes of coming to a general engagement; but finding that he could not draw Montmorenci out of his lines, he first besieged Arles, and then Marseilles. This was the capital error of Charles's life; but he was hurried into it by the personal antipathy he had towards Francis, and the hopes he had conceived from the indignation which the French protestants had expressed against the same prince, for the inhuman treatment of his protestant subjects; and a fond expectation he had, that he would be joined by the French protestants against their tyrant.

The imperial

and the Experience soon convinced him how ill all his projects were founded. The French united to a man in the defence of their country and king. Montmorenci, and the duke of Orleans, harrassed the imperialists so terribly that their numbers were diminished to one fourth; and to carry those back alive, Charles found himself under a necessity of raising the siege of Marseilles, which he did on the twenty-fifth of September 1535, and to return to Italy; where, upon a review, he found he had not ten thousand men left, and that many even of those were unfit for duty.

Death
of the dauphin.
Vol. IX.
p. 110.

While the invasion of France by Charles continued, his eldest son, the dauphin, died, most probably of a surfeit, or some other species of intemperance; tho' some of the French historians have attributed his death to poison, administered to him by an agent from Charles. Had they laid it upon his sister-in-law Catharine de Medici, the charge would have been more probable. A person who was executed for having administered the poison, is said, at his death, to have accused Ferdinand Gonzaga, and Anthony de Leva, with the murder. The duke of Orleans thus succeeded to the title of dauphin, at a time when his father's reputation was at its highest pitch, and when he was adored by his subjects. The count of Nassau, one of Charles's generals, at the time of his invading Provence, had made an irruption into Picardy, from the Low Countries, and had besieged Porcenne; but he was obliged to raise the siege by the valour of the marquis de Fleuranges, who defended it, and who was afterwards known by the name of the marshal de la Marck; and Nassau being obliged to return to the Low Countries, France saw herself all at once delivered from an enemy which threatened her destruction.

Francis

Francis was, in matters of religion, entirely under the Francis direction of the cardinal de Tournon, a violent bigot to the befriends church of Rome; the king of England demanded that the cardinal famous cardinal Pole, who was then in France, should be Pole. delivered up to him as his subject and rebel, Francis continued to protect him, and not only suffered him to reside at Cambray, but hinted to Gardiner, the English minister, that he was of Pole's opinion in the affair of the divorce. This produced a sudden coldness between Francis, and Henry; and Charles himself, for reasons that are foreign to this part of our history, appeared inclinable to renew his good correspondence with the English monarch. This naturally induced Francis to throw his eyes towards Scotland, then governed by James V. who, tho' the next male heir to the crown of England, was a violent Frenchman in his heart.

During the invasion of France by the emperor, James had James V. raised sixteen thousand men, which he had proposed to of Scotland carry over to the assistance of Francis; but through the marries crossness of the winds, the ship which carried himself was his daughter. the only vessel of his fleet that reached France. Landing at Dieppe, he posted to the other extremity of France, where he found Francis in his camp, and he made a formal demand of the princess Magdalen, Francis's daughter in marriage. Francis granted his suit, and the nuptials were celebrated with great magnificence. Besides the very rich presents in plate, hangings, armour, and other costly furniture, that Francis made on this occasion, I perceive he gave his son-in-law four ships of war, two of which were laden with powder, and the other with ordnance. He likewise sent him fifty-six pieces of brass cannon, paid his wife's fortune in ready money, and defrayed all the expences of his journey. The bride died soon after her arrival in Scotland; but all the address of Francis, by his ambassador Pomeray, could not reconcile Henry to this match; and, had it been possible for Henry to have reconciled the legitimacy of his daughter, the princess Mary, to his late proceedings, he would immediately have closed with Charles; but all he could, at this time, do, was to declare for a neutrality, in the war between him, and Francis.

The renunciation of feudal claims was a perpetual source War re- of dissention, among the princes of the continent in those newed in days. Charles had declared, by virtue of some imperial su- Artois. periorities, Francis, a rebel, and had summoned him to appear before his court. Francis did now the same by Charles; and under pretence of the latter having violated the treaty of Cambray, he resumed his sovereignty over Flanders, and Artois, which he had given up by that treaty. He then invaded Artois, and took Hesdin, St. Paul, with some other places, while the imperialists under the count of Buren, besieged Terouenne. D'Annebaut threw succours into the last mentioned city; but in his return he was defeated and taken prisoner by the imperialists; who likewise retook St. Paul. After some other operations in the field, Mary, queen of Hungary, governess of the Low Countries, and sister to the queen of France, interposed, and prevailed on both parties to agree to a truce for three months. Francis took that opportunity to send the dauphin, and the marshal Montmorenci, to Savoy, where he relieved Turin, and recovered all that the French had lost in that country. Francis was preparing to support him vigorously in person, and had raised the siege of Terouenne, when the queen of Hungary, being now strengthened by the mediation of the pope, prevailed upon him to prolong the truce, and to consent that both parties should retain what they held, till all their claims could be settled by a definitive treaty. This agreement was a great disappointment to the Turkish emperor, Solyman, who had made vast preparations for carrying on the war with vigour. This truce was partly owing to the differences which again broke out between Charles, and the princes of the league of Smalcald, and in some measure obliged him to abandon the interest of the duke of Savoy, whose dominions were thus sacrificed to Francis.

Coldness between Henry and
Francis.

It would be tedious to recount here the various proposals of alliances, marriages, interviews, and the like, between Francis and Charles, that filled up this short truce. The more the emperor was pressed by the protestants in Germany, the more ready he was to treat with Francis, and the more did Francis disregard Henry VIII. to whom he owed the arrears of his pension for four years. To give the greater weight to those negotiations, Francis continued his preparations for war; he conferred the constable's sword upon Montmorenci, for his excellent services, and raised Montejan, and d'Annebaut, to the degree of French marshals. Before the expiration of the truce, a negotiation was advanced pretty far between Henry VIII. and Charles, who offered to give the investiture of Milan to the infant of Portugal, provided Henry would give that prince his daughter, the princess Mary of England, in marriage.

tion.

Chatillon, the French envoy at London, informed Francis of this negotiation, and that the Milanese was to be guarantied to the infant by the emperor, and the kings of England and Portugal. The pope made Francis sensible of the consequences of this alliance, and, notwithstanding the almost incredible animosities between them, Charles and Francis agreed to have an interview at Nice. Henry complained of this juggle, but he was answered by the queen regent of the Low Countries, that the young couple were too nearly related to be married without a dispensation from the pope. The interview took place at Nice; but the negotiations were carried on under the mediation of the pope, who lodged in a monastery near that city, while the emperor emperor remained at Villafranca. It was not the interest of his holiness that those two great princes should be thoroughly reconciled; and nothing was concluded upon, but that each should keep possession of the duke of Savoy's dominions as he then held, and that they should renew the truce for ten years. Thus, that duke was made the sacrifice, while his holiness took care to lay the foundation of his own house, by procuring a marriage between Ottavio Farnese, and Margaret of Austria, the emperor's natural daughter.

During those conferences, the queen of France came by sea to pay a visit to her brother at Villafranca. A temporary bridge being thrown from the shore to her galley, for her more commodious landing, as her brother the emperor was conducting her ashore, the bridge giving way, both of them dropt into the sea, and it was with some difficulty they were saved.

The conferences at Nice being over, Francis went to Avignon, and Charles embarked for Spain; but being forced back upon the coast of France, he came ashore, and sent a messenger to Francis, to signify that he would be glad to have a personal interview with him. Francis was amazed and at receiving this message; and not to be behind hand with his brother monarch in this mark of confidential honour, he immediately went to Aigues Mortes, where they mutually entertained each other with the same openness and cordiality as if no animosity between them had ever subsisted. It does not, however, appear, from the consequences, that they came to any definitive resolution, farther than perhaps, that of supporting the Roman catholic religion against Henry VIII. Upon their parting Francis returned to Laon, and the crowd, when he entered that city, was so great, that his chancellor, Anthony de Bourg, was thrown from his mule and trod to death. He was succeeded by William Poget, who, for his agreeable talents, was in great favour with Francis. It appears, as if Gardiner, the English resident, at the court of France (whose aversion to the protestant religion was afterwards distinguished by many bloody tokens) had betrayed his master's secrets to Francis, who at this time, conceived both a contempt and hatred for Henry. Soon after Charles and Francis had parted at Aigues Mortes, the latter sent instructions to his ambassador, the bishop of Tarbes, to conclude a new treaty with Charles, by which, each party engaged himself to conclude neither treaty, alliance, nor marriage, with England, or to enter into any connection with that crown, without the knowledge of the other; so apt are princes, as well as other men, to run to extremes in their affections.

Soon after the conclusion of this remarkable treaty, Charles received advice of a dangerous insurrection, which had happened in the city of Ghent, on account of some impositions attempted by the governers of the Low Countries; and which required his presence to quell. The danger being pressing, Charles employed the bishop of Tarbes to write to the French court for leave to pass through that kingdom; the sea between Spain and the Low Countries being covered by English or Algerine ships. The insurgents at Ghent, by this time, had offered to put themselves under the protection of Francis, who nobly rejected their application, and sent advice to Charles of all that had happened, with assurances of observing the strictest honour on his part, as to every thing relating to his safe passage through France. Francis did not, however, come to this resolution, without consulting his council about an offer which Charles made at the same time, of granting the investiture of the Milanese to the duke of Orleans. The cardinal of Tournon was for Charles giving this promise under his hand; but the constable observed, that writing could not make it more valid, if Charles's had a mind to break it, and that to trust to his honour would enhance the obligation. His advice was approved of. The dauphin, and the duke of Orleans, offered to remain in Spain as hostages, till the arrival of Charles in the Low Countries; but the latter, who met them at Bayonne, rejected all security but that of his brother's honour and good faith. Francis was then recovering from a dangerous fit of sickness, yet he met the emperor at Chastelleraud, to conduct him to Paris; where the entertainments given to Charles were magnificent beyond expression. But such was the delicacy of Francis, that no mention was made of the investiture, and the emperor having made a most pompous progress through the greatest part of France, was, with all imaginable marks of respect and deference to his high quality, conducted by Francis to St. Quintin, and by the dauphin and his brother to Valenciennes.

*He de-
Francis.*

Charles having suppressed the insurrection of Ghent, by executing twenty-four of its ringleaders, was by the French ministers put in mind of the promised investiture. He did not deny it, but, he pretended that he had made it only on condition that Francis should give up Turin, which he still continued to hold. He threw in many other qualifications and excuses; but as if he had been ashamed of so barefaced a breach of promise, he offered to give his daughter in marriage to the duke of Orleans, with the Low Countries for her portion. Finding Francis inclinable to treat upon that proposal likewise, it was soon clogged with such restrictions as proved that Charles had never been sincere in what he had promised, and meant only to get rid of a present danger. Henry VIII. took that opportunity to send over the duke of Norfolk to try to bring Francis to renew his connections with England, but without any effect. Charles hearing hearing of this attempt, communicated to Henry all the secret designs against England, which Francis had the weakness to discover to him; and this exasperated Henry more than ever against Francis.

The latter must have possessed an extraordinary share of Who disequanimity, if he could have reflected with patience upon graces his the gross treatment he had received from Charles. His usual own mifrankness and openness forsook him all at once, and he nisters, looked with an angry eye upon the constable; who finding himself in disgrace, retired to his castle at Chantilly. The admiral relying upon his own innocence, so far disregarded his master's frowns, as to affirm to his face, that his innocence would be proved upon a trial, which he set at defiance. Francis was provoked by this, and ordered him to be imprisoned in the castle of Melun, while Poget, the chancellor, garbled a commission of judges, who durst do no otherwise than as he directed, and who, pretending that the admiral had raised some undue imposts by virtue of his office, condemned him to lose his employments, and to suffer banishment. Francis was struck with surprize when this sentence was laid before him; because, from the representation Poget had made of the admiral's crimes, he expected it would have been capital. He blushed at what he had done, pardoned the admiral, and referred the revisal of his process to the parliament, who pronounced him innocent, and restored him to his estates and honours. This malicious prosecution brought the chancellor to such dis-repute, that he was prosecuted, lost his office, suffered four years imprisonment, paid a fine of a hundred thousand livres, and died universally despised, in his old age.

Francis did not now find himself the same respectable His credit monarch he was before he was outwitted by Charles; and decays, of Charles; and finding that his interest with the protestants was now next to nothing, he renewed his connections with the Turks, to the horror of all Europe. He next took under his protection the duke of Cleves, whom Charles wanted to strip of Guelphes, and gave him in marriage Joan of Albret, heiress of the kingdom of Navarre, who was no more than eleven years of age; so that the nuptials never were consummated. In order to counteract the emperor's negotiations at Venice, and the Porte, he employed two agents, Fregosa, and Rincon, to proceed to Venice; but they were murdered in their journey by the marquis del Vasto, the emperor's general. Francis filled all Europe with remonstrances against this breach of the law of nations; but receiving no reparation from Charles, who disavowed the fact, he resolved to do himself justice by force of arms. Ever title, the marshal d'Annebaut had acted as constable of France, and Bellay, baron of Langey, had succeeded d'Annebaut in the government of Piedmont. The bad success of Charles in a second expedition to Africa, encouraged Francis to begin hostilities, which he would have commenced in the emperor's absence, had he not been afraid of the English. At last, he came to be upon better terms with Henry, by means of a negotiation set on foot for a marriage between the duke of Orleans and the princess Mary, which did not take place, and by securing the Scots in his interest.

The imperial dominions invaded by the French.

In the spring of the year 1541, the duke of Orleans entered the dutchy of Luxembourg at the head of forty thousand men, commanded, under him, by the duke of Guise. His success was rapid, for he reduced Damvilliers, Yvoi, Arlon, Vireton, Montmedi, and Luxembourg itself. Another French army, under Langey, acted in Piedmont. The dukes of Cleves, and Longueville ravaged Brabant; the duke of Vendosme entered with another army into Artois, and the dauphin, with a fifth army, attacked Perpignan, one of the chief frontiers of Spain. Francis had been enabled to make those prodigious efforts by the indignation which his subjects had conceived at the unworthy treatment he had received from the emperor; but his successes were of no long duration. The duke of Orleans dismissed the greatest part of his army, left the duke of Guise to command in Luxembourg, where he was obliged to shut himself up in Yvoi, while the prince of Orange retook Luxembourg, Montmedi, with several other places, and drove the duke of Cleves out of Brabant. The siege of Perpignan, by the dauphin, who commanded a great army, attracted the attention of all Europe, because it was thought that Charles would in person attempt to raise it; in which case, Francis declared that he would put himself at the head of his troops and give him battle. The duke of Alva defended the place for three months with a garrison of Spanish veterans; and the besieged being disappointed of assistance from the Spanish fleet, d'Annebaut, now made admiral of France, was sent, together with the count of St. Paul, to inspect the operations. Their opinion was, that they should be discontinued, and the siege was accordingly raised, towards the end of October 1542.

The operations of the war continue.

In the spring of the next year, 1543, the duke of Longueville, and Rosen, general to the duke of Cleves, defeated the duke of Arscot, and killed four thousand imperialists, besides making five thousand prisoners and taking all their baggage and artillery; but they were afterwards baffled in two attempts they made upon Antwerp and Lorraine. Francis took and fortified Landrecci, and once more sent the duke of Orleans, attended by admiral d'Annebaut, into Luxembourg, which they again reduced. The French were not so successful in other other quarters. Charles arriving in Germany, put himself at the head of his army, and attacked the duke of Cleves; who was so ill supported by Francis, that he was forced to purchase his pardon, by renouncing his alliance with France and Denmark, and hiring out his troops to Charles. He was likewise obliged to dismiss the princess Joan d'Albret, to whom he had been contracted.

This misfortune, together with the defeat of the Scots by Henry VIII. and the death of James V. of Scotland, was severely felt by Francis, who had now imprudently disoblged Henry beyond the power of reconciliation. He had not only thrown out some sarcasms against Henry's person, which were, perhaps, exaggerated by his ministers, Poget and others, but, depending on the assistance of the Scots, he had, in a manner, refused to suffer Henry to continue neutral in the disputes between him and the emperor; and his subjects had, upon many occasions, insulted the English shipping.

On the eleventh of February, 1543, an offensive and de- The En- tisfy Henry for all the arrears of the pension due to him; and likewise, to give up the dutchy of Burgundy to Charles;

with other demands that amounted to a declaration of war.
Henry accordingly sent ten thousand men, under Sir John Wallop, to invade France and join the imperial army. They began their operations on the twenty-second of July, 1543;
and, after ravaging all the French territories through which they passed, they joined Charles as he was besieging Land- reci. Francis had under him some excellent generals, who relieved Landreci, and obliged Charles to retire, though he had threatened to march to Paris: and thus the campaign, on that side, was ended without any general action, which was expected.

Francis, notwithstanding the outcry he had raised against Francis is himself among all the Christian powers, continued, more assisted by and more, to cultivate his connections with the Turks. He the Turks, had at the Porte an agent, one Paulin, who managed with to say, that, after alarming all the coast of Italy, they were joined by twenty-two French gallies, under Francis, count of Anguien, of the house of Vendosme, who was no more than twenty-three years of age.

ance. Add to this, that, from all accounts, the French fleet appears to have been but poorly provided, and was furnished with many necessaries by the infidels. The confederate fleets sailed to Nice, which city they besieged, but were unable to take the castle, though they lay before it two months. The imperial admiral, the brave Andrea Doria, came with a fleet to its relief; but could not force the French and the barbarians to a battle: so that they, in a manner, escaped to Toulon; where Barbarossa was guilty of so many acts of violence, that Francis was glad to be rid of him in the ensuing spring.

Though Barbarossa had affected to treat the count of Anguien as a school-boy, yet he soon gave proof of his being a great military genius. The duke of Savoy, and the marquis del Vasto, after the departure of the confederate fleet, had taken Mondovi, by a capitulation; which they broke by putting to the sword the Swiss garrison. Langey, the French general in Piedmont, one of the ablest politicians and generals of his time, was now dead; and Bouillieres commanded for Francis in that province. He had taken St. Germain, and had almost reduced Yvree; but finding himself superseded by the count of Anguien, he raised the siege, by carrying the whole army to receive the count on the frontiers of the province, under pretence of doing him honour. The count of Anguien receiving his command, laid siege to Carignan; which del Vasto resolved, at all hazards, to raise; but, in order to give our reader some idea of the critical situation of France, at this time, it is necessary to turn his eyes to other quarters.

detested
by all Europe.

Charles had lately held a diet at Spire; where he animated the members so effectually against Francis, that protestants, as well as papists, united in declaring him their common enemy; and had voted to employ against him, under the emperor, twenty-four thousand foot and four thousand horse. The Swiss themselves were ashamed of serving any longer in the French armies; and Henry VIII. had raised an army, which landed at Calais, about Whitsuntide, 1544, with an intention to march to the gates of Paris. The English being joined by the imperial general, the count of Buren, with fourteen thousand troops, invested Montreuil; and Henry arriving, in person took the command of his army from the duke of Norfolk, and besieged Boulogne; while Charles, instead of advancing towards Paris, as he had promised to Henry, besieged Commerci and Luxembourg.

The war
in Pied- mont continues.

Such was the deplorable state of the French monarchy, which was now destitute of all allies but the Turks, while del Vasto, as we have already seen, was preparing to raise the siege of Carignan. The count of Anguien had, in his army, the flower of the French troops and nobility; so that his defeat must have been fatal to France. When he applied to Francis for leave to fight the imperialists, who were superior to his army in number by ten thousand men, it was granted on account of the desperate state of the French affairs in other quarters, and against the sentiments of the old officers.

The count, obtaining the permission he desired, engaged and defeated the imperialists, on the fourteenth of April, at Cerizolles. Ten thousand were killed on the spot; three thousand were made prisoners; and all their artillery, ammunition, and baggage, fell into the hands of the conquerors. The consequences of this great victory were, that the count of Anguien reduced Carignan, Montcallier, St. Damian, Vigon, Pont d'Esture, and the greatest part of Montferrat; by which he secured France against any attack from that quarter. The urgent necessities of Francis's affairs in other places, disabled him from reducing all the Milanese, which, at that time, was very practicable; and his victorious troops were obliged to defile towards Champagne and Picardy, where his greatest danger now lay.

Notwithstanding the victory of Cerizolles, France must still have been ruined, had it not been for the ambition of Charles and the obstinacy of Henry. Count William, of Furstenberg, the imperial general, after reducing Luxembourg, Commerci, and Ligni, by order of Charles, formed the siege of St. Didier. This town, which was far from being noted for strength, was certainly no object equal to that of his junction with Henry, and their march to Paris. Didier was defended by la Lende, du Bueil, and the count of Sancerre; and the preservation of France was owing to the amazing defence it made for six weeks, when it obtained an honourable capitulation. Henry had called upon Charles to set out to meet him, but the latter refused to raise the siege of Didier; and, when it was taken, Charles summoned Henry to begin his march; but he, in his turn, insisted upon reducing Boulogne.

This management gave Francis leisure to provide for the defence of his kingdom; and, though Boulogne was taken on the fourteenth of September, the garrison was suffered to march to Montreuil, which still held out. The dauphin, all this while, was commanding an army of observation against Charles, who seized the French magazines at Epernai, and Chateau-Thierry; which saved his army, already greatly reduced, from destruction. Charles, at last, began to yield to the instances of his sister, the queen of France, his confessor, and, above all, his first minister, Granvelle, for listening to an accommodation, to which he invited Henry's ministers likewise. Henry declined having any concern in the matter; but the negotiation was, at last, concluded at Crequi; or, as others call it, Crespi. The chief articles were, that the duke of Orleans should marry Mary of Austria, the emperor's eldest daughter, or the second daughter of the king of the Romans; and that he should have with either, as a fortune, the Milaneſe or the Low Countries, with the earldoms of Burgundy and Charolois, at the option of the emperor: but, if he gave them Milan, he was to reſerve, in his own hands, the caſtles of Milan and Cremona, until there was a ſon from the marriage. That, if Charles ſhould give them the Low Countries, Francis was, for himſelf and his heirs, to renounce, for ever, all pretenſions upon the Milaneſe and Naples.

Parties at the court
of France.

This peace was partly occaſioned by the intrigues of the French court, which was divided between the parties of the dauphin and the duke of Orleans. The dauphin remonſtrated ſtrongly againſt the peace, as foreſeeing that the continuance of the war muſt ruin the army of Charles. The dutcheſs of Eſtampes, Francis's favourite miſtreſs, mortally hated Diana of Poitiers, who was miſtreſs to the dauphin; and the dutcheſs is ſaid to have ſaved the army of Charles from ruin, by contriving that the French magazines ſhould fall into his hands. Be that as it will, the concluſion of the peace was a wiſe meaſure on the part of Francis, though it was privately proteſted againſt by the dauphin and the parliament of Thoulouſe, as derogatory to the dignity and the rights of the French monarchy.

When it was notified in the English camp, all the imperial troops under the duke of Norfolk, who ſtill continued the ſiege of Montreuil, left the English army; and Henry, after formally accusing Charles of perjury, treachery, and breach of faith, returned precipitately to England. Francis was ſenſibly touched with the loſs of Boulogne, and made diſpoſitions for retaking it. At the time of its capitulating, he was upon his march to relieve it; and Henry's retreat had been ſo ill judged, that the breaches of the lower town had not been repaired; ſo that it was ſurprized by a party of the French: but the dauphin not coming up, in time, with his main army, to their ſupport, and they themſelves obſerving no diſcipline, they were eaſily diſlodged by the English, who poured down from the upper town.

Plans for invading England.

Francis being now free from the dread of the emperor, formed a mighty plan, notwithſtanding his late miſcarriage at Boulogne, not only for retaking all that the English held in France, but for invading England itſelf. He aſſembled a vaſt fleet at Havre, conſiſting of a hundred and fifty large veſſels, fixty ſmall ones, and thirty-five Genoeſe and Mediterranean galleys, which he hired. Thirty-four thouſand land men were put on board this armament, which was commanded in chief by admiral d'Annebaut; but before he ſailed, his own ſhip, carrying a hundred guns, was conſumed by an accidental fire. Notwithſtanding this, the admiral ſet ſail, and came up with the English fleet near Portsmouth. Though its ſtrength and number of ſhips were far inferior to that of d'Annebaut, they did not decline an engagement, but the French retired, after loſing one of their best ships by a brisk cannonade. Next day the French renewed their attack with the same success as before, they not being able to prevail with the English to leave their advantageous situation. After various consultations, d'Annebaut made a landing on the isle of Wight, where he had some thoughts of erecting fortifications, while another part of the French landed in Sussex; but the dispositions every where made by the English government were so excellent, that the French were baffled in all their attempts, and d'Annebaut was obliged to return to France. Soon after this, the English, under lord Lisle, repaid the visit of the French, and burnt the town of Treport, in Normandy. It was computed that this year, the English, notwithstanding the formidable fleet of their enemy, made prize of above three hundred sail of French ships.
beſt

During those unsuccessful attempts of the French, by sea, Francis never lost sight of his capital point, that of expelling the English out of France. He had given the command of his land troops to marshal de Biez, who had served him with great success in Picardy, and the Low Countries. His orders were ill executed; for he failed in constructing a fort which was to command the harbour of Boulogne. While de Biez was employed, d'Annebaut landed all the pioneers to the number of four thousand, that he carried out for his English expedition, and Francis himself came to his camp, at Mont Lambert, where Boulogne was blocked up on the land side. De Biez attacked and carried some of the lines of the Terre d'Oye, and defeated a handful of English who attempted to retake them. But the season was now so far advanced, and so unhealthful, that the expectations of Francis, which he had endeavoured to carry into execution at so prodigious an expence, were entirely frustrated. An epidemical distemper swept off great numbers of his soldiers, and among others, his son, the young duke of Orleans, whom he had carried with him into Picardy to be witness of his triumphs over the English, and who was suspected to have died of poison. At last, the campaign for the year 1545 ended, to the loss and disgrace of the French; who being at peace with all the world but the English, had strained every sinew of their state, in their preparations to drive them out of France. The English, on the other hand, though inferior both by sea and land in numbers, were excellently well officered, and were so little distressed by the utmost efforts of the French arms, that during all the siege of Boulogne, they kept the communications open between that town, Calais, and Guisnes; nor do we find that their government was even alarmed at d'Annebaut's descent. This, perhaps, was in some measure owing to a body of eight or ten thousand foot, which Henry had actually hired in Germany, but were stoppt by the emperor, on their march to Boulogne, so that the

the whole glory of the campaign was due to the English alone.

The death of the duke of Orleans, who was the darling of his father, had a sensible effect on the affairs of Europe, as well as of the French court. Francis sent the marshal d'Annebaut to propose to Charles some arrangement for carrying the treaty of Crequi into execution, notwithstanding that prince's death; but Charles, who was now infirm, and testy, drily answered, "That he would enter into no farther engagements, but he would not be the aggressor." In the mean while, the earl of Surry, the English governor of Calais, was defeated in a slight engagement by the marshal de Biez; and the war between the French and English was renewed in Picardy, but with so little prospect of advantage to either party, that both of them accepted of the mediation of the German protestants. The negotiation had no effect, because Francis would not treat without the Scots, and Henry refused to restore Boulogne.

A treaty
concluded.

Notwithstanding this, both princes renewed the negotiation by their own subjects. The lord Lisle was first plenipotentiary for Henry, and, d'Annebaut for Francis. They met at a place called Campe, between Ardres and Guifnes; and after a few conferences, a treaty was concluded, by which Francis engaged himself to pay two millions of crowns, besides a claim of five hundred thousand more (which was to be referred to commissioners) to Henry, on consideration of the latter restoring the town and fortifications of Boulogne. Henry likewise consented to the comprehension of the Scots in the treaty, provided they gave him no fresh provocation. But he was to keep possession of Boulogne till the money was paid. Both parties were so heartily tired of the war, that though both complained of the bad execution of the treaty, yet no hostilities ensued.

Francis being now at peace with all his neighbours, endeavoured to strengthen himself, by retrieving his credit with the German protestants, and sought to engage Henry to assist him; but his furious minister, Tournon, not only dissuaded him from those wise purposes, but prevailed with him to renew the persecution against his own protestant subjects. It was chiefly owing to this zealot, who knew the weak side of Francis, that that prince, in the last years of his reign, did not make amends for the abuses that had been introduced in the first; and for the numerous oppressions, which his subjects had suffered through the perpetual wars he maintained.

Francis.

Francis, before his death, had re-entered into a good correspondence with Henry, whose death, which happened in January 1547, is thought to have greatly affected Francis. He had for some time been ill of a slow fever, which he sought to shake off by frequent changes of air; but removing to Rambouillet, he grew sensible that his latter end was

was approaching, and sent for the dauphin, to give him his last advice, which is said to have been pious and edifying, and worthy of a king who loved his subjects, and was sensible of his own misconduct. Among other matters, he recommended to him to cherish the admiral d'Annebaut, but not to recall the constable, Montmorenci to his councils. He died on the last of March, in the fifty-third year of his age, and the thirty-third of his reign.

We have already sufficiently exhibited the political character of Francis. His personal bravery, as appeared from his behaviour at the battle of Pavia, was equal to any thing we meet with in romance itself; and, had he not been a king, he would have been one of the most amiable private gentlemen of his age. Some of his poetical compositions, still extant, shew him not to have been destitute of genius in that way. The sums he laid out in buildings, paintings, jewels, and other magnificence, were immense; but, towards the latter end of his reign, he became an excellent œconomist, discharged his debts, and left his successor four hundred thousand crowns in ready money.

His character,

He lost his first wife, Claude of France, when she was twenty-five years of age, and by her he had three sons, Francis, Henry, who succeeded him, and Charles, duke of Orleans. The first, and the last, are said to have died of poison. His daughters, by the same marriage, were Louisa, and Charlotte, who died young; Magdalen, who was married to James V. of Scotland, but died in the seventh month of her marriage. She is said to have been educated under her aunt the queen of Navarre, who was a protestant; Margaret, who was married to the duke of Savoy, and who was esteemed a most accomplished princess. By his second wife, who was queen dowager of Portugal, and sister to the emperor Charles V. he had no issue. Francis was of so amorous a complexion, that he had many mistresses, and it is thought that he partly owed his death to a venereal taint designedly given by a husband to his wife, by whom it was communicated to the king. The maiden name of his favourite mistress was Anne de Pisseleu, and her husband, John of Bretagne, was created duke d'Estampes.

Henry II.

THE kingdom of France appeared to be in perfect tranquility, when Henry II. mounted that throne. He was then twenty-nine years of age, and having through the ascendancy of the dutchess d'Estampes, during the late reign, been under a kind of a cloud, he disregarded all which had been recommended to him by his father on his death-bed. He connected himself with the ambitious princes of the houses of Lorraine and Guise. He arbitrarily disgraced the admiral d'Annebaut, who had done his father so many services, and he recalled the constable to his council board. At his coronation, the duke of Guise took place of the duke of Montpensier, though the latter was a prince of the blood. The duke of Aumale, son to the duke of Guise, was introduced to the council board, in the room of cardinal Tournon, the religious firebrand of the late reign; the secretaries of the state were disposed; the dutches d'Estampes retired to her estates, where she turned protestant; and in short, the court of Henry II. was composed of persons entirely different from that of Francis I. In some cases, the punishment of the parties was carried farther than bare disgrace. The marshal de Biez was degraded and imprisoned, we think not without reason, for his conduct towards the end of the late reign, and his son-in-law, de Couci, lost his head, (though not till two years after) for his cowardly surrender of Boulogne to the English.

Henry, soon after his accession, gave his personal sanction to a public duel, fought between the lords of Jarnac and Chasteneraye, in which the latter, who was by far the strongest man, was defeated, and dying of heart-break, Henry vowed to give no farther encouragement to such encounters. The queen being then delivered of a daughter, Henry affected to signify to all Europe, that the good correspondence between his crown and the Swiss cantons was renewed, for one of their deputies carried the child to the font; but the cantons of Zurich, and Berne, nobly disclaimed all connections with Henry; because he continued the inhuman persecutions begun by his father, against the protestants. He did not, however, greatly affect the residence of too many cardinals at his court, and he sent seven out of twelve to Rome, to take care of his interest there. It was with a like view that he readily consented to the queen dowager retiring from his dominions to those of her brother.

His hatred of the emperor. Henry, in many other respects than that of persecuting the protestants, followed the maxims of his father's government. He had a violent passion for reviving his family claims in Italy. He personally hated Charles V. for the treatment he had received from him while a hostage at Madrid. He burned with impatience to be in action against the English; and he cultivated the friendship of the Scots, whose history forms part of that of his reign. James V. upon the death of Magdalen of France, demanded from Francis, Mary, the widow of the duke of Longueville, and sister to the duke of Aumale, in marriage, whom he obtained without difficulty. This princess did all she could to render Scotland a province of France. Being mother to the young queen, Mary, who was but a few days old at the time of her father's death, she was declared regent of the the kingdom, and entered into early measures with the princes her brothers for sending her daughter over to be educated in France. The opposition she met with by the growth of the reformation in Scotland is foreign to this history, farther than as it relates to the French. Henry being resolved not to lose the benefit of so useful an ally, sent over a fleet with six thousand veterans on board commanded by d'Esse, or, as some call him, d'Este, and upon their arrival they were joined by eight thousand Scots of the regent's party. Under this powerful protection, the young princess was embarked on board the French ships under the command of Ville Guyon, who landed her safely in Bretagne, from whence she was conducted with great pomp to Henry's court.

As Henry was firmly resolved upon a war in Italy, he carefully visited his frontiers on that side, and made a progress through his kingdom as far as Piedmont. When he was at Moulins, he assisted at the marriage of Anthony de Bourbon, duke of Vendosme, with Joan de Albert, heiress of the crown of Navarre, the same who had been betrothed to the duke of Cleves, the male descendants of which marriage now fill the thrones of France, Spain, and Naples. Before he finished his progress, the province of Guienne was in a combustion of rebellion, on account of the gabelle, or tax upon salt, and the insurgents proceeded with uncommon fury against all the objects, of their resentment. At Bordeaux, the populace, contrary to their own promise, murdered Monems, the king's lieutenant, though it is said, both the parliament and magistrates interposed to save him; but that did not prevent their being punished in a manner, which nothing but the atrocity of the offence could justify. The king ordered the duke of Aumale, and the constable Montmorenci, to quell the insurrection, and separate armies were assigned them for that purpose. The duke proceeded through Xantoigne, and by a prudent lenity, re-established the authority and tranquillity of the government, and rendered himself highly popular. The constable cloathed himself in terror, and marching by the sea-side, he marked his way by punishments. Arriving before Bordeaux, the inhabitants submitted; but he refused to enter their city any other way than by a breach, which he ordered to be made in their walls, and he treated them, in every respect, as a conquered people, who had surrendered at discretion. He caused a hundred of their substantial citizens to be hung up, abolished the privileges of their city, demolished the town-house, and carried his revenge for the death of Monems, who, it seems was his relation, even to a degree of frenzy, for he obliged a hundred of the chief inhabitants to dig with their fingers, his body out of the grave, that it might receive an honourable interment.

A rebellion in his kingdom suppressed and punished.

The persecutions against the protestants still continued, and Henry, thinking the clergy too mild in their proceedings, directed that they should be carried on by commissioners named out of the parliament of Paris, but he reinstated the people of Bordeaux in all their privileges, and restored the parliament to its functions.

Continues
the war
with Eng-
land.

Henry being resolved to prosecute his father's views upon Boulogne, laid hold of the minority of Edward VI. and refused to ratify the late treaty, which had not been ratified by Francis, who died before he had an opportunity. During the war between Scotland and England, his subjects had made reprisals on the English, under Scotch colours, which was complained of by Bryan, the English ambassador; but he received no satisfaction. The divisions in the council of England, both as to politics and religion, gave great encouragement to Henry, who saw, with pleasure, the coldness of the emperor towards Edward, and his ministry. Two forts lying near Boulogne were betrayed into his hands, and he ordered his army to rendezvous at Montreuil, the beginning of August, to which place he repaired in person, as did the constable, and the duke of Aumale, after the queen's coronation had been performed with great splendour. Henry carefully concealed his real design, that of besieging Boulogne, and before he set out on his expedition, he amused himself and his court, by ordering a great number of his protestant subjects to be burnt before his eyes. All of a sudden, war was proclaimed against England, and Strozzi, one of Henry's admirals, attacked an English squadron near Jersey, but with very indifferent success, if what the English historians say is true, for he lost a thousand of his men in the engagement.

Besieges
Boulogne,

The siege of Boulogne was now formed, and was chiefly carried on by Chastillon, afterwards the famous admiral Coligni; but he was beaten off in every attack, by the lord Clinton, the English governor, with so much resolution, that Henry, seeing he could not so much as prevent the English from receiving succours by sea, left the siege entirely to the management of Coligni, who turned it into a blockade; and even that he was soon obliged to raise. Henry suffered in his reputation by being baffled in an expedition which he had undertaken in person, attended by all his great generals.

which he buys by treaty from the English.

He employed one Guidot, a Florentine merchant, to give him secret intelligence of the state of the English ministry, and to sound the disposition of the regent, duke of Somerſet, towards giving up Boulogne. Guidot had all the success he could desire, and the negotiations opened at a place near Boulogne, in the beginning of the year 1550. According to the English state papers, the French behaved with the utmost insolence during the treaty; but at last, the necessities of the English government were such, that they agreed to deliver deliver up Boulogne, upon their being paid, in six months time, a sum equivalent to a hundred and thirty three thousand, three hundred and thirty three pounds, six shillings, and eight pence sterling. The Scots and their affairs were comprehended in the same treaty, and time was given for the queen regent to accede to it. Nothing but their own divisions and wants could have induced the English to agree to so scandalous a treaty, by which they, in fact, gave up all the arrears due upon their subsidies, and all their views of obtaining Mary, the young queen of Scotland, for their master; a point which had kindled an expensive war between the two nations. The treaty was executed with great punctuality, and the French again entered into possession of Boulogne, after giving six of the first princes of the blood, and noblemen, as hostages for the second payment of the money. A better understanding than had subsisted for some years then succeeded between France and England. Edward sent over the order of the garter to Henry, who returned him the compliment by that of St. Michael.

The reformation of France, had, by this time, received a great blow by the death of Margaret, queen of Navarre; and the duke of Aumale, who afterwards became so famous in the French history, had succeeded his father as duke of Guise. He had two brothers, cardinals, the one of Lorraine, the other of Guise; who likewise distinguished themselves in a political as well as a theological capacity. Henry had taken umbrage at the conduct of Julius III. who had succeeded Paul III. in the popedom; and edicts were issued for preventing money from going out of the kingdom to Rome, and for correcting other abuses introduced by the papal agents in France. But a most remarkable incident which happened at this time, requires that we should look back to the late reign.

We have often mentioned the Albigeneses, who were likewise distinguished by the name of Waldenses, and other appellations. A remnant of them still continued to live between Provence and Dauphiny. They had with incredible labour cultivated their country, which was naturally barren, and they are represented as a people equally simple in their morals and religion; but worshipping God in a manner very different from that of the church of Rome. Their numbers during the late reign had increased to eighteen thousand, and in the profession of their religion they never had met with any check, either from the magistrates, or their landlords, who found them to be an inoffensive people, and their estates were improved by their industry. Their habitations lay under different sovereigns; some of them being subject to the French king, some to the duke of Savoy, and some to the legate of Avignon. As they had no regular clergymen among them, the reformers in the neighbouring countries officiously offered them the assistance of their ministers, ministers, and this rendered them obnoxious to the French government; but Langoy, Francis's governor of Piedmont, gave them so good a character, that Francis ordered all proceedings against them to be stopt. The bigots, however, prevailed, and the Waldenses of Merindol, and the neighbouring places, being not without a tincture of enthusiasm in their compositions, imprudently challenged their adversaries of the established church, to dispute with them upon the truth of their religion. Cardinal Tournon took advantage of this, and obtained from Francis letters for putting the sentence of the parliament of Aix against them, into execution, by which a number of them were put to death, their habitations demolished, and their wives and children banished. It is said, that cardinal Sadolet, bishop of Carpentras, in vain opposed this murdering edict, which was rendered general, and still more cruel, when it was known at court that the poor people refused to abjure the religion they professed. Nineteen of the Waldenses were ordered to be put to death in 1545, and the execution of the sentence was committed to one Oppede, president of Provence, and Guerin, the attorney-general. Those two bloody enthusiasts called in the military to their assistance, and though they met with no resistance, they butchered all who did not save themselves by flight. The aged, the feeble, and the young, fell in an undistinguished carnage. Their harvests, their plantations, their houses, and granaries, were destroyed by fire. Sixty men and women, who had shut themselves up in the town of Cabrières, were immediately put to the sword, though they had surrendered on promise of their lives being spared. The miserable inhabitants were hunted in the night time from place to place, by the flames of thirty-two villages, which they themselves had lately peopled; and, instead of nineteen heretics, mentioned in the original sentence, being put to death, some thousands were massacred; the few that escaped retiring to Piedmont, or Bohemia. Even Francis I. though himself a most inhuman persecutor, was struck with horror when he heard of those barbaries, and on his death-bed, he is said to have recommended the punishment of the murderers to his son. The affair was referred to the parliament of Paris. Oppede, by his wealth, and interest, escaped, and the advocate, Guerin, alone was hanged.

Growth
of Lutheranism.

Vol. X.
p. 265.

This scanty execution of justice was partly owing to a political cause; for the growth of Lutheranism was now so great in France, that Henry thought proper to gratify his protestant subjects with one instance of his protection, before he set out upon the great expedition he was meditating. The count de Brisac was made governor of Piedmont, and had orders to support Octavio Farnese against the pope and the emperor. Brisac accordingly saved Parma to Octavio, and the pope threatened to excommunicate Henry, especially after a Turkish fleet, directed by his ambassador, who was on board it, appeared in the Mediterranean, and overawed both the emperor and the pope. The conduct of Henry on this occasion resembled that of his father. Though he was at war with the pope, he continued to burn the heretics, and he concluded a treaty with the protestant princes of the empire, as the guardian of the Germanic liberty, by which he was to be put in possession of Verdun, Toul, Metz, Nanci, and Lorrain. In consideration of this, Henry obliged himself to pay to the elector of Saxony, and his other allies, two hundred and forty thousand crowns, and sixty thousand for every month, after three, that the war should continue. Vol. IX. p. 120.

The Roman catholics beheld the progress of Henry's Turkish allies with horror; but it had all the effects Henry intended. The elector of Saxony reduced the emperor almost to ruin, and obliged him to agree to the pacification of Passau, which may be called the constitutional basis to the open exercise of the reformed religion in Germany. Pope Julius, who had depended on the emperor for support, was obliged to humble himself before Henry, and his nuncio was forced to submit his powers to the parliament of Paris, about the end of the year 1551. ibid.

France, for many years had not been at so high a pitch of prosperity as then, but it cost Henry immense sums, which he raised upon his people in the most oppressive manner. The provinces of France were almost depopulated, and the people resorted in such numbers to Paris, and the other great cities, that an edict was published against any additional buildings. The constable, Montmorenci, was then the greatest subject in France, and his barony of Montmorenci was erected into a duchy and peerage. Brisac commanded, with great abilities, the French armies in Piedmont, and the other parts of Italy; and was assisted by Strozzi, and Horace Farnese. But the greatness of Henry obstructed his own progress. The princes of the house of Guise sought to aggrandize their master by the ruins of their own family, that of Lorrain, the natural barrier of the empire against France. ren-ci made con-

Early in the year 1552, Henry marched, at the head of a great and well appointed army, towards the Rhine. He had appointed his queen to be regent in his absence, and he had given her the admiral d'Annebaut, whom he had recalled to his court, for her first minister. When he entered Lorrain, he acquainted that duchess, that there was a necessity for her son, the young duke, to be educated at Paris, and that the regency of the duchy should be committed to his uncle the prince of Vaudmont. After that, Henry seized Toul, Verdun, and Metz, took possession of all the country between Haguenau and Wessembourg, and would have be-

The reader, in a former part of this work, has seen the dangerous situation of the empire at the time we treat of; and the Swiss, as well as the confederate princes, began to think that their liberties were now as much in danger from Henry as they had been from the emperor, with whom they were then treating. They intimated their desire to Henry, that he would stop the career of his arms, and in this they were seconded, not only by the Swiss, but by the court of England, which had lately discovered, and disappointed, a design laid by Henry for surprizing Calais.

Henry.

Henry was sensible that the jealousy of his power might be fatal to his ambition, and he therefore affected great moderation. After garrisoning his new conquests, he returned to France, which had been invaded by Rossom, the imperial general, under the regent queen of the Low Countries. He reinstated Robert de la Marck in his dutchy of Bouillon, which had been seized by the emperor, and he took several places in Luxembourg. In Italy, Henry had re-established Ottavio Farnese in the dutchy of Parma, and Brisac was master of Sienna. The emperor desired to be included in the truce between the pope and Henry, who consented to it, to the great disappointment of the Turks, who expected that he would carry his arms into Naples. The princes of the empire were every day more and more convinced of their danger from Henry, and all of them but Albert of Brandenbourg, who likewise joined the confederacy soon after, united themselves with Charles, and agreed upon besieging Metz, which was accordingly invested by an army of a hundred thousand foot, twelve thousand horse, and a proportionable train of artillery. It was defended by Francis, duke of Guise, the greatest hero, perhaps, of his age, who had in his garrison five thousand of the best French infantry, three princes of the blood, two of his own house, fifty noblemen, and five hundred gentlemen of distinction. His brother, the duke of Aumale, endeavoured to succour the place, which was large and poorly fortified, but he was beaten by Albert of Brandenbourg, while the imperial general, the count of Roeux, was filling all Picardy with desolation. Charles then thought himself certain of reducing Metz; but he was disappointed through the valour and vigilance of the duke of Guise, who had demolished thirty convents and churches to prevent the approach of the besiegers, and was perpetually harrassing them with sallies. Charles lay sixty five-days before the town, and finding he had lost one third of his army, he raised the siege on the twenty-sixth of December. The duke of Guise's magnanimity was remarkable on this occasion. He considered the imperialists as objects of pity.

Instead

The imperialists forced to raise the siege of Metz.

Instead of cutting them off, as he might have done, in their retreat, he saved all he could, and sent them to be relieved in his hospitals and convents.

Early in the year 1553, Charles attempted to be revenged for his disgraces before Metz; and his general, the count de Roieux, besieged Terouenne. It was defended by d'Esse, the same who had served with so much reputation in Scotland; but he was killed in a breach of the walls. His successor, Montmorenci, son to the constable, offered to capitulate; but, in the mean time, the Flemish and German infantry broke into the town; where they put all to the sword, without distinction of age or person; and it was with difficulty that the chief officers were saved from the massacre. Charles was so much exasperated, that he ordered the city to be demolished so completely, that its vestiges, at present, are scarcely discernible.

Upon the death of the count de Roieux, Charles gave the command of his army to the prince of Piedmont, who besieged Hesdin; which was defended by the marshal de la Marche, who was son-in-law to Henry's mistress, the dutchess of Valentinois. Henry had just then recovered from an illness which he had contracted by the fatigue of the preceding campaign; and he was celebrating the marriage of his natural daughter, Diana, to Horace Farnese, who threw himself into Hesdin, where he was killed by the blowing up of the castle; which gave the imperialists an opportunity of entering the place, and of treating the inhabitants in the same manner as those of Terouenne. Vol X. p. 269.

The prince of Savoy, who was naturally a complete soldier, obtained great credit by this campaign. Though Henry was at the head of above sixty thousand excellent troops, yet he could neither force the prince to a battle, nor form the siege of Cambray; which vexed the constable, Montmorenci, into an illness. Henry, however, defeated the imperial general, the duke of Arschot, who commanded the Flemish cavalry; but he soon after sent his troops into winter-quarters, not much to the credit of his arms. The pope comes over to the French interest.

The war was, all this while, raging in Italy; where the pope was entirely in the French interest, and gave Henry absolute resolution for breaking the truce, in order to make himself master of Naples. The emperor gave orders for besieging Sienna; but the Turkish fleet, under the famous Dragut, appearing on the coast of Naples, the siege was raised; and Dragut, having joined the French fleet, beat that of Doria; while the French general, des Termes, who had defended Sienna, reduced great part of the island of Corfica; but Dragut and he quarrelling, the Genoese recovered it all but Fiorenzo. The marshal Brisac was still in Piedmont, where he carried on the war with unparalleled humanity, by exempting all degrees of people, but real soldiers actually in arms, from hostilities. ibid. p. 272.

Edward

Henry treats
with the English.

Edward VI. was then king of England, and, through the weakness of his administration, he had been so little considered at the French court, that his subjects had been prodigious sufferers by sea. At last, the English ministry, declaring that they were ready to enter into a league with the emperor against Henry, the latter sent St. Andre, one of his courtiers, to make satisfaction to the English merchants; but his real design was to lull the English government asleep, while he was fomenting a rebellion in Ireland; which was discovered and prevented. The duke of Northumberland, the over-bearing minister of Edward, having views upon the English crown for his own family, courted Henry's friendship, and offered his master's mediation between him and the emperor. Henry treated the proposal with great respect; but his demands were so exorbitant, that the proposition fell to the ground; and the project of a league (in which the protestant princes were to be included) between the emperor and the crown of England, for reducing the French power, was far advanced, when Edward unfortunately died.

Henry besieged Renti, but retires.

Pope Julius, about the same time, offered his mediation, but without effect; for Charles had now secured queen Mary for his son; and insisted, in his turn, upon very high terms. Henry, instead of complying, took the field with sixty thousand men, whom he divided into three armies; one under himself and the constable, and the other two under the duke of Vendosme and marshal St. Andre. The constable took Maricburgh, fortified Rocroi; and Henry, about the beginning of July, took Bovines by assault, and punished the inhabitants by hanging or drowning, for having obliged him to bring his artillery before their town, which was but slightly fortified. The duke of Vendosme formed the siege of Dinant, and obliged don Juliano Romano, with his Spanish garrison, to surrender it, and to leave the place without arms or baggage. Charles, on his part, took the field likewise; and, there being a personal quarrel between Henry and the queen-regent of the Low Countries, the war was carried on with great acrimony. Henry demolished some beautiful seats belonging to the queen-regent, but was unable to force Charles to a battle. He took his revenge by ravaging the open country of Artois and Cambresis; and, at last, he besieged Renti; a town which was then of such importance, that Charles resolved to venture his army in saving it. The prince of Savoy and Gonzaga accordingly advanced to give Henry battle; but they lost two thousand men, and were defeated by the valour of the duke of Guise. The constable, Montmorenci, who was now old and cautious, and is said always to have served with reluctance against the emperor, advised his master not to pursue his purpose farther, lest he should share the fate of his father, who was in similar circumstances at the battle of Pavia. Though Henry was full of spirits, and had distinguished his valour at the head of his Swiss

Swiss guards, yet he took the constable's advice ; and, contenting himself with having added to the safety of his frontiers, he made an orderly retreat into his own dominions.

Strozzi, at this time, commanded the French garrison in Sienna ; which Cosmo de Medeci, the duke of Tuscany, had undertaken to reduce for the emperor. For this purpose, he gave the command of an army to the marquis de Marignan, who besieged Sienna, but without effect. Having turned the siege into a blockade, Strozzi left the defence of the place to Monluc, an excellent officer, and marched into Tuscany, where he besieged Marciano with nine thousand men. He was followed by Marignan, and, being pressed for want of water, he was obliged to raise the siege. He might have returned with safety to Sienna, could he have submitted to the appearance of a flight in the night time ; but disdaining that, he was attacked and beaten, with the loss of four thousand men, his artillery and baggage. He had, however, the glory of preserving Sienna for that campaign.

About this time, 1554, Metz narrowly escaped being surprized by a detachment of the imperialists, who were defeated by the French. Brisac continued to be gaining ground in Piedmont ; but, though it was then the dead of winter, Marignan renewed the siege of Sienna ; which, at last, surrendered ; but Monluc refused to sign the capitulation, tho' he approved of it as being very honourable for the republic. From the romantic notions which prevailed in that age, he would suffer his troops to owe their safety only to their own swords ; and, upon his bringing them back to France, he was rewarded with a marshal's baton.

The court of Henry, at this time, was full of faction. Strozzi had been sacrificed to the intrigues of the party that opposed the queen, to whom he was related. By the same influence, the marshal Brisac was hindered from relieving Sienna, his numbers being too few ; but he surprized Casal towards the end of the carnival. The famous duke of Alva was appointed imperial general in Piedmont and Italy, where he distinguished himself by his usual cruelty ; but he was more than once beaten by the duke of Aumale.

The pope continued to insist upon a peace between France and the emperor. He employed cardinal Pole for that purpose, and Henry found himself in a very embarrassing situation. He would willingly have kept well with England ; but queen Mary was devoted to the pleasure of her husband and the house of Austria. The friendship of the German protestants was of the utmost consequence to his interest ; but they insisted upon his giving up Metz, Toul, and Verdun. He gave good words to all, but demanded the Milanese as the price of his compliance with either ; which Philip refused and set him at defiance.

The emperor, Charles, though now out of humour with the world, and resolved to resign all his dignities, retained,

to

to the last, his predilection for the Low Countries; and, to secure them from the insults of France, he built Charlemont and Philipville, but he was disappointed in an attempt he made to retake Mariembourg. His general, the prince of Orange, had better success in Picardy; which he invaded and ravaged almost without opposition; so distracted was the French court by its divisions.

Charles V. The resignation of Charles V. and his retirement to a cloistered life, filled all Europe with surprize. The German empire devolved upon his brother Ferdinand; but clogged with such terms, that he was on the point of resigning it to his nephew Philip, had he not been deterred from that resolution by the protestants, who trembled at the thoughts of seeing the imperial and Spanish crowns reunited.

About this time died the king of Navarre; and his successor and son-in-law, Anthony, duke of Vendosme, retired to Bearn, that he might preserve the small portion which still remained of his wife's inheritance. The deaths of pope Julius III. and Marcellus II. and the accession of cardinal Caraffa, who took the name of Paul IV. were events favourable to France; for Paul hated the house of Austria; and, upon his mounting the papal throne, courted the friendship of Henry. His advances were highly favoured by the house of Guise. The cardinal of Lorraine sought to make an interest with his holiness, whom he was in hopes of succeeding; and the duke of Guise, though he concealed his ambition, secretly thought that, being a descendent of the old Anjouvine house, he had a right to the crown of Naples. Paul sent the cardinal of Tournon, from Rome, to negotiate the alliance. Arriving at Henry's court, he declared himself against the commission that he had been employed to carry; and he was seconded by the constable, Montmorenci; who, though he was the most venerable personage in France, was borne down by the Guises; and the cardinal of Lorraine went to Rome, where, in Henry's name, he put the last hand to the treaty, in the year 1555; both parties agreeing to keep it secret for some time.

Truce between France and Spain. During the cardinal's absence, the constable, and the English cardinal, Pole, had credit enough to persuade Henry to agree to a truce with Philip for five years. This disconcerted all the schemes of the pope, who intended to give an establishment in Naples to his nephew, cardinal Caraffa; and his holiness sent him to the French court, with private instructions to persuade Henry to break the truce, and to give him absolution for his perfidy. It was in vain for the constable, with the wiser and honestest part of Henry's council, to exclaim against this flagrant breach of faith, which pointed towards a destructive war in Italy. The queen was joined by the dutchess of Valentinois, the king's mistress, whose daughter was married to the duke of Aumale; and both of them supported the house of Guise, who were furious for a war.

war. The pope was so much in earnest on the same side, ibid. that he ordered the Spanish ambassador at Rome to be put under an arrest, on pretence of a conspiracy against his person. He refused to acknowledge Ferdinand as emperor of Germany; and he threatened both Charles and Philip, who he said had forfeited the kingdom of Naples, with excommunication.

The duke of Alva was then the Spanish governor of Naples; and, in September, 1556, he invaded, and subdued, the dominions of the church to the gates of Rome. Henry had taken no care to support his new ally, the pope, in his vigorous measures. He sent him, indeed, a few troops under Strozzi and Monluc; but they durst not look those of the duke of Alva in the face; and the grand army, which was to have been sent into Italy, under the duke of Guise, was so slow in its motions, that the papal interest in Italy was crushed, and Henry had not an ally there but the duke of Ferrara. Early in the year 1557, the army under the duke of Guise arrived in Piedmont, where Brisac still continued to command, and he advised the duke to invade the Milanese. His reasons were so strong, that the duke dispatched an express to court, where the proposal was at first agreed to, but afterwards over-ruled by the queen's and the cardinal of Lorraine's faction, and the duke was ordered to march directly to Rome; but he was too late; for, by this time, the pope had been disabled from fulfilling his conditions, and the duke found it impracticable for him to penetrate into Naples. But we are now to attend to the state of the war in other quarters.

All France was amazed that Henry continued so brave and so able an officer in Piedmont as Brisac was; but it was owing to his jealousy that the dutchess of Valentinois was fond of that marshal's fine person. In the beginning of June, an English herald, on the part of his mistress, queen Mary, declared war against France at Henry's court; and, soon after, twelve thousand English joined the imperial general, the duke of Savoy, at Givet. The duke's army then exceeded sixty thousand men. The French court had exhausted itself so much in its preparations for the Italian expedition, that admiral Coligni had but few troops to oppose this formidable power. The duke of Savoy, after many marches and counter-marches, sometimes threatening Rocroi, and sometimes Marienburg, all of a sudden invested St. Quintin. The admiral threw himself, with a few battalions, into the place; and his uncle, the constable Montmorenci, drawing together twenty-five thousand men, advanced to his relief. He was too weak to fight the duke of Savoy; but, on the tenth of August, he gave him such an alarm, that he was obliged to fly to count Egmont's quarter; and, had it not been for the courage of his English auxiliaries, under the earl of Pembroke, he must have suffered a total defeat.

Every thing was then mismanaged on the part of the French. D'Andelot could not reinforce his brother, the admiral, with above five hundred men. The constable had been too precipitate in advancing, and was too slow in retreating, in the face of a superior army. The duke of Savoy recovered his consternation; but count Egmont, at the head of the English and Spanish cavalry, attacked the flank of the French, through a defile which he imagined to be impassable; and the duke charging them in the front at the same time, the constable was totally defeated. Three thousand six hundred French were killed on the spot; an equal number was made prisoners; and the whole of their baggage and artillery, excepting two pieces of cannon, were taken. The brave duke d'Anguien, and about six hundred persons of distinction, were among the slain; and the constable himself, with the dukes of Montpensier and Longueville, and the marshal de St. Andre were among the prisoners; while the Spaniards did not lose above fifty men. In short, the defeat of the French was so complete, that, when the emperor, Charles, heard of it, in his retirement, he asked the messenger, whether his son was not in possession of Paris.

Loyalty
of the French to their king.

Philip called a council of war immediately after the battle; and it was there proposed to raise the siege of St. Quintin, and to march directly to Paris. The duke of Savoy opposed that measure, because of the great number of strong places he must have left in his rear. Philip acquiesced, and it was resolved to press the siege of St. Quintin. The gallant defence made by the admiral, gave Henry and his generals time for recovering from their consternation; but, on the twenty-seventh of August, the place was carried by storm, and its garrison put to the sword. Its reduction was followed by that of Ham, and several other strong places; and Philip again was pressed by his English auxiliaries to march against Paris, as the obstacle was now removed that obstructed him before. But another interposed. The French nobility and gentry, to a man, made offer of their persons and purses to the service of Henry. The duke of Guise, who had been recalled, was in full march homeward; and the Swiss cantons declared themselves in favour of France.

In the mean while, an Alsatian gentleman, one Nicholas de Polkweiler, having raised a body of ten thousand men, on pretence of employing them against the Turks, suddenly passed the Rhine at Strasbourg, and, in all probability, would have surprized Lyons, if the Swiss cantons had not interposed and obliged him to return to Alsace. But this was not the only good fortune that attended Henry at this time. The English were discontented at the duke of Savoy (who, probably, depended upon the success of Pollweiler's irruption) for not marching to Paris; and refused to serve longer under Philip; while his German mercenaries mutinied for want of pay, and part of them went into the service of France.

Admiral

Admiral Coligni had been taken prisoner at the reduction of St. Quintin; and both he and his uncle, the constable, were in the hands of the Spaniards, when the duke of Guise returned to France with his army. Henry's escape from being assassinated by one Caboché, who drew his sword upon him, and was afterwards hanged, seemed to endear him, more than ever, to his subjects; and their immense contributions enabled him to encrease the duke of Guise's army with fourteen thousand Swiss. That general had suffered in his reputation by his Italian expedition, but he was now considered as the guardian-angel of France, especially as Philip had been obliged to send his army into winter-quarters, without daring to advance into the heart of the kingdom.

D'Oysel then commanded the French auxiliaries in Scotland, and undertook to give such a diversion to the English as should facilitate the long wished-for reduction of Calais to the French king. Though the general aversion of the Scotch reformers for the French prevented him from entirely fulfilling his promise, yet it is certain that the queen-regent of Scotland and he were of vast service to the duke of Guise, in the plan he had formed against Calais, in the winter-time. It is said to have been originally formed by admiral Coligni, who had proceeded so far in it as to reduce it to writing. Be this as it will, it is certain that the duke prosecuted his scheme with great abilities. The French shipping was all drawn towards the Straits of Dover, to cruize upon the English trade; but with orders, that the commanders should hold themselves in readiness for a grand expedition. One great body of troops took post at Boulogne, under pretence of securing the inhabitants from the insults of the Spaniards; while another, under the duke of Nevers, defiled towards Luxembourg; and, after drawing the attention of the Spaniards to that quarter, he rejoined the duke of Guise, who, all of a sudden, put himself at the head of an army, and set down before Calais, on the first of January, 1558.

The lord Wentworth was then the English governor of Calais; and, by the unaccountable negligence of his court, his sieges and garrison did not exceed seven hundred men. The operations of the French began against an out-fort, called St. Agatha, which the English were forced to abandon, and to throw themselves into fort Newnham. D'Etreés, who commanded the French artillery, battered this fort in breach, while the duke of Rochfoucault besieged the castle of Rysbank, which commanded the harbour. All the French attacks proved successful. The English, in fort Newnham, obtained an honourable capitulation, and retired into the town; but those in Rysbank were forced to surrender prisoners of war. The French being masters of the harbour, landed immense quantities of stores and fascines from their shipping; by which they filled up the morasses that secured the town on the land side. The duke of Guise then ordered a false attack to be made made upon the body of the place ; but, all of a sudden, directed his artillery against an old castle, defended by a wet ditch, which was drained with surprizing expedition by d'Andelot ; so that, next day, the duke passed it, up to his middle, supported by five hundred cuirassiers under Strozzi, and all the young nobility of his army. The breach that had been made by fifteen battering cannon was stormed, and those that defended it put to the sword ; so that the French made a lodgement in the castle, the command of which the duke gave to his two brothers, the dukes of Angoulême and d'Elbeuf. The English made prodigious efforts to retake this castle ; but all were in vain ; and the garrison being now reduced to two hundred men, lord Wentworth offered to treat. All the terms he could obtain were, that a hundred and fifty of his garrison should have liberty to retire to England or Flanders ; while he himself, with the chief officers who remained, were to be prisoners ; and the place, with all within it, was to be given up to the duke of Guise, who made des Termes its governor.

The French general, after this, being resolved to complete the reduction of all that the English held in France, besieged Guienne ; the garrison of which, under the lord Grey, made a noble defence : but, on the twenty-second of January, they were obliged to submit to the same capitulation that had been granted to that of Calais. The English then abandoned the castle of Hames ; and thus the conquest of Calais, and all the places depending upon it, was completed in a month, after being two hundred and ten years in possession of the English.

treach-ery of cardinal Pole.

It can scarcely admit of the least doubt, that the reduction of Calais was chiefly owing to the treachery of cardinal Pole, who was queen Mary's first and sole minister. He had exasperated the pope, by suffering Mary to take part in her husband's quarrel against France ; and he sought to be reconciled, by betraying his country's interest to the French. To him it was owing, that Calais was left in a defenceless condition, and he sacrificed it to the family of Guise, to appease the indignation of the pope, who was on the point of excommunicating him. The duke of Guise was now in the zenith of his glory, and the king obtained, with great cheerfulness, three million of livres from an assembly of his states, which he convoked at Paris. Henry then set out, with the dauphin, upon a progress to visit his frontiers, and made a public entry into Calais. But the princes of the house of Guise were now obliged to strike into the most diabolical measures for their own support. They knew that they were hated by the constable ; and the king could not conceal his jealousy of them, notwithstanding the vast services they had done him. Almost one half of the people of France were protestants, and considered the admiral Coligni and d'Andelot as their heads.

The

The duke of Guise, and the cardinal of Lorraine, knew the The dauphin's weakness in matters of religion, and resolved to work upon it. They pressed for the consummation of the long intended marriage between the dauphin and their niece, the young queen of Scotland; which was accordingly celebrated on the twenty-fourth of April. The ceremony was performed in the presence of eight Scotch commissioners, four of whom are said to have opposed the matrimonial crown of Scotland being given to the dauphin, and died, in their return home, with evident marks of poison.

In a visit which the dutchess of Lorraine this year paid to her son, she carried with her Granvelle, the bishop of Arras, an able, but a dangerous, minister; and it is said, that the destruction of the protestant religion in France was, at that time, concerted in an interview he had with the cardinal of Lorraine, who informed Henry that d'Andelot was an heretic. Henry scarcely believed him, but d'Andelot owned it to his face; which threw him into such a passion that the dauphin was hurt in interposing between them; and d'Andelot was stripped of his colonel-generalship of the infantry and sent prisoner to Melun.

The duke of Guise was then besieging Thionville, before which Strozzi lost his life; but the place was taken in seventeen days: and des Termes, who received Strozzi's baton of marshal, was ordered to penetrate into Artois and Flanders; where he accordingly took Dunkirk and Bergues. He was opposed by count Egmont at Gravelines; where he was defeated, and taken prisoner, with the loss of five thousand men; chiefly owing to a squadron of English ships, who poured their fire into the flank of his army.

His place was supplied by the duke of Guise, who covered Calais and the rest of the French frontier towns; but, could the English nation have been brought to act cordially with the Spaniards, Calais might then have been recovered. Instead of that, the English fleet withdrew from the coasts of France, which left the duke of Guise at liberty to reinforce his army from Bretagne.

The house of Guise, all this time, continued to inspire Henry with distrust towards all whom they thought not to be in their interest. It was with difficulty that the brave marshal Brisac, after all his important services, preserved himself from being broken; and, at last, they practised against the dutchess of Valentinois herself; who, at the age of seventy, retained her empire over the king's heart. The duke of Guise, under the title of lieutenant-general of the kingdom, actually exercised the functions of viceroy, and took precedence of the constable; so that his power was thought to be too deeply rooted to be shaken even by the dutchess herself.

Both Henry and Philip had, this year, taken the field in their own persons; and they lay at a little distance from each each other at the head of their respective armies, but without coming to any action. This was owing to the dutches of Valentinois, who spoke the language of the honestest and wisest part of the French nation, and opened her royal lover's eyes to the miseries which his subjects were suffering through the continuance of the war. Philip, despairing of being supported by England, where his wife was in a dangerous state of health, assumed the like sentiments, which were encouraged by his general, the duke of Savoy; and it was agreed on all hands, that the aged constable, Montmorenci, who still remained a prisoner, should repair to the French camp, and set on foot the negotiation. At first it met with great difficulties, as Philip insisted upon the restitution of Calais, and Henry on that of the kingdom of Navarre. At last, they agreed to a suspension of arms, and plenipotentiaries were named to meet at the abbey of Cercamp. Those for the French were, the constable, the marshal St. Andre, the cardinal of Lorraine, the bishop of Orleans, and d'Aubespine, secretary of state.

Its terms.

Upon the first meeting of the plenipotentiaries, those of France declared positively, that they could not treat upon the restitution of Calais, because their master was determined never to give it up. During their sitting, Mary, queen of England died; and queen Elizabeth took care that Henry should have a secret hint, that it was far from being impossible, if he continued unreasonable, that a marriage might not take place between herself and Philip, who had actually made her proposals of marriage. This produced an offer from Henry of a separate peace; and Elizabeth, the new queen of England's ministers, instructed her plenipotentiaries still to insist upon the rendition of Calais; but this they soon found to be impracticable, and the conferences were transferred to Chateau-Cambresis. There, the French ministers threatened to return home abruptly, if any mention was made of the restitution of Calais; and Elizabeth, who never had seriously encouraged Philip's addresses, gave her ministers orders to put the last hand to the treaty; by which Calais, to save the English honour, was to remain only eight years in possession of the French. But this article was quickly evaded, and Calais remains in their possession to this day. The other parts of the treaty chiefly consisted of the towns of St. Quintin, Hames, and Catalet, being restored to the French; while they gave up to Philip the strong towns of Thionville, Marientberg, Montmedi, Hesdin, and the county of Charolois, in full sovereignty. The French likewise obliged themselves to demolish Terouenne and Ivri, to restore Bouillon to the bishop of Liege; Montferrat to the duke of Mantua; Corfica to the Genoese; and Savoy, Piedmont, and Bresse, to the duke of Savoy; and Philip was at liberty to keep troops in Verciel and Asti, till the French claims upon Piedmont should be adjusted. In short, France, in the whole, gave up up no fewer than one hundred and ninety-eight fortified places by this peace of Chateau Cambresis.

Though that peace seemed to be inglorious for France, and was exclaimed against by the Guise faction, yet it certainly rendered that monarchy more compact within itself, especially as Henry was left in possession of Metz, Toul, and Verdun, and all that he held in Lorraine and Alsace. The most inglorious part of it to France has been stifled by the French historians, for he was obliged to give security for the payment of five hundred thousand crowns, and hostages for the performance of the restitution of Calais, was refused, or unreasonably delayed beyond the term of eight years. The truth is, however, that this obligation was to be void, if the English, within that time, should either attack the French, or their allies, the Scots. So that, upon the whole, this stipulation was evidently calculated to humour Elizabeth, and the people of England under her new administration.

Besides those articles about towns and territory in the Marriage treaty, Henry renounced all his claims in Italy, and at the earnest request of the constable promised to shake himself loose from his disgraceful alliance with the Turks. Philip agreed to marry the princess Elizabeth, Henry's eldest daughter, who had been promised to Edward VI. of England, and to don Carlos, Philip's son; the princess Claude, the second daughter, having been a few months before married to the duke of Lorraine. The duke of Savoy was likewise to marry the princess Margaret, Henry's sister. In the beginning of June, the duke of Alva, came to Paris, where he espoused the princess Elizabeth for his master. After the ceremony was performed the king held a tournament in the antient manner; and he himself, with the dukes of Guise, Nemours, and the prince of Ferrara, were spondents, to answer all challenges. Henry acquitted himself with great honour for two days; but on the evening of the second, which was the thirtieth of June, he insisted upon breaking a lance with the count de Montgomery, one of the most active men in France, at those exercises, and son to de Lorges, captain to the king's guards. It was in vain for the queen to endeavour to dissuade Henry from this fatal sport, and during the encounter Montgomery's spear shivering in his hand, one of the splinters went through Henry's eye, and the wound proved mortal, but not immediately. He fell from his horse, and was caught by the dauphin, and some other persons present; but it is probable he had no sensation after. The duke of Savoy's marriage with his sister, however, was celebrated on the ninth of July, and Henry died on the tenth, in the forty-second year of his age, and the thirteenth of his reign.

His death was most unseasonable for his country, which he had just restored to tranquillity, by abandoning the former maxims of his reign, and adopting those of the constable, which were wise, moderate, and favourable to his protestant subjects. Though not himself learned, yet he patronized learned men; but in the beginning of his reign he was so intent upon his own and his court's tasteless, but expensive, pleasures, that he lavished immense sums. He seems to have acquired a true notion of his people's interest chiefly from experience; but it was owing to his mistress, the dutchess of Valentinois, that he came at last to dislike the house of Guise. He was brave and active in his own person, and his reign is distinguished by the fortunate reduction of Calais, in which some of his greatest predecessors had failed. He was so much under the influence of his mistress, that the queen had no opportunity of discovering the infernal qualities she afterwards practised, though she instilled them into her children, whose education she superintended; and it was, perhaps, owing to the private connections she had formed at her husband's court, that he did not carry his ruinous Italian schemes into execution.

and issue. Catharine de Medici, at the time of her husband's death, was forty-one years of age, but so exquisite a mistress of dissimulation, that, though the most ambitious woman in the world, she had lived with him upon an easy footing. After being married ten years before she had a child, she bore him ten; five sons and five daughters. The sons were Francis, who succeeded him; a duke of Orleans, who died in his cradle; Charles, who succeeded Francis; Alexander, who took the name of Henry, and succeeded to Charles; and Hercules, who at his confirmation received the name of Francis; and was afterwards successively duke of Alençon, Brabant, and Anjou. The daughters were, Elizabeth, married to Philip II. of Spain; Claude, wife to the duke of Lorraine; Margaret, who was afterwards married to the king of Navarre; and two princesses, who died in their cradles.

Francis II.

Great power of the Guises in France. THE sudden death of Henry II. fundamentally altered all his arrangements. His son Francis, who then mounted the French throne, was almost as weak in his intellects as in his person, and the French monarchy may be said to be directed by the house of Guise; all of them, especially its head, men of great abilities, and united in inclination as well as interest. Their sister was queen regent of Scotland, and their niece was sovereign of that kingdom, and queen consort of France. The relation they bore to that princess was the source of great calamities to her country. They impressed both her and her husband with with a notion, that queen Elizabeth, being an adulterous bastard, had no right to the crown of England, which ought to be placed on Mary's head; and the dauphin, in his father's life-time, not only took the title of king of Scotland, but assumed the arms and title of England in his wife's right. Henry, before his death, disliked this proceeding so much, that he had actually sent a minister to Scotland, to persuade the queen regent to tolerate the reformed religion there, and another minister was ordered to give queen Elizabeth all manner of satisfaction, and that the king-dauphin, as he was called, should be obliged to lay aside her title and arms. The death of Henry reversed those salutary councils. The queen regent was encouraged to proceed against the protestants, and her brother, the marquis d'Elbeuf, was put at the head of an army sufficient for exterminating the reformed religion in that kingdom.

Notwithstanding the power of the Guises, they were not without opponents. Next to the king's brother, Anthony, king of Navarre, and his brother Lewis, prince of Conde, the duke of Montpensier, and the prince of Roche Guion, were the first princes of the blood, and highly resented their being excluded, as in fact they were, from the king's councils. The constable and his family, who were very powerful and active, were in the opposition likewise, and admiral Coligni was considered as the head not only of the protestant party, but of the moderate Roman catholics, who were chiefly directed by the constable. Though the queen dowager was not of a humour to act an underpart in an administration, yet the strong support the Guises had in the person of their niece, the queen, the most beautiful and accomplished princess of her age, made her prudently submit to leave the chief management of affairs to the Guises, upon their abandoning the dutchess of Valentinois, who was forced to betake herself to a private life. The Guises exercised their power with unparalleled address. The duke took the direction of military affairs, but they preserved a vast shew of moderation. The constable had retired to his seat at Chantilly, and, through the influence of his wife, continued to profess the Roman catholic religion; but though he lost his place of master of the household, his eldest son obtained a marshal's baton. Brisac was made governor of Picardy instead of the prince of Conde, to whom the late king had designed that honour, and he was sent with a pompous embassy to the court of Spain. Some other popular promotions were made about the same time; for the seals of chancellor being taken from Bertrandi, who was now a cardinal, were given to the chancellor, Olivier. The use of fire arms was prohibited; the lands which had been alienated from the public were reannexed to the royal domain, and one person was suffered to hold only one place of honour or profit.

Conduct
of the prince of Conde.

All their precautions, however, could not avert the public odium. The protestants hated them, and were joined in their opposition by the moderate papists. The prince of Conde was poor, enterprizing and active, and in an assembly which was held by the heads of the opposition at Vendosme, it was proposed to take arms to deliver the king out of the hands of strangers. The king of Navarre, who was a soft, easy prince, and was cajoled with the hopes of being able to recover his dominions, would not agree to any violent measures, and retired to Bearn. The malecontents were disconcerted by his defection, but a vast number of military officers, most of them protestants, being now thrown out of their bread, repaired to solicit their arrears and employment at court, where the Guises thought themselves so well settled in the administration, that they published an edict, threatening to treat them as traitors if they did not depart within a prefixed time. This edict was so far from having the desired effect, that it blew the flames of discontent, (which the government attributed to protestantism) higher than ever. In the persecuting time of the late reign, Henry had ordered seven members of parliament to be put under arrest, and one of them, Anne du Bourg, after being committed to the bastile, signed his confession of faith, which was found to be same as that of the protestants. Du Bourg, being a man of inflexible integrity and resolution, persisted in his profession; and an inquisitor, one de Mouci, with the bishop of Paris, and a committee of the parliament, tried and condemned him, but his execution had been respited.

The public commotions at the time we treat of, were so violent, that some popish counsellors of parliament were killed on the streets, which gave such offence to the Guises, that on the nineteenth of December, du Bourg was carried to the common place of execution, where he was hanged, and his body burnt. As he died with prodigious intrepidity, he was considered by his party, as a martyr for liberty as well as religion; and the protestants became now, in a manner, outrageous. The king's health obliged him to go to Blois; the Guises persuaded him to add to each of his parliaments a chamber for trying and punishing heretics. Those chambers proceeded with such fury, that they got the name of Chambres ardentes, or Burning Chambers.

The cruelty of those new courts of inquisition made more proselytes to protestantism than all the sermons of their preachers had done. A general assembly of the protestants was held at Nantes, and consisted of a hundred and fifty deputies from the different provinces; and had the protestants preserved their moderation, it might have been fatal to the Guises, if not to the Roman catholic religion in France. The straitened circumstances of the prince of Conde,
had

had not allowed him to declare himself openly, the head of the protestants; but he was known to be the soul that animated their party.

The court was then at Blois, and it was resolved at this Conspiring meeting to make one Renaudie, their avowed agent, but racy of they pitched upon the prince of Conde, as their concealed Amboise head, or, as they called him, their mute chief. Renaudie, defeated who was a man of resolution and address, was sent over to and purchased England, where he solicited supplies from Elizabeth, who wished, would readily have granted them, had she found that the king of Navarre had declared himself for the malecontents. Both she, however, and some German princes, gave Renaudie so favourable a reception, that the protestants came to a resolution to surprize the court, which was then at Amboise, and to force the king to declare the prince of Conde lieutenant-general of the kingdom. This conspiracy was conducted with equal art and secrecy, though the execution of it was entrusted with vast numbers. The conspirators agreed to defile in small bodies towards Amboise, and to meet at a certain place. They spent almost six months in their consultations and preparations; but a lawyer, one Peter Annelles, to whom Renaudie entrusted the secret, discovered it to the Guises, who were with difficulty brought to believe him. They were amazed at the king's and their own defenceless state. Two or three hundred men, and those not well provided for action, were all the guards the king had about him; and those were to resist five hundred gentlemen, and their numerous attendants, with a thousand veteran regulars under thirty experienced commanders. The Guises, however, were neither daunted nor disconcerted, and they made use of the king's name to bring together a body of men, whom the duke headed; and his dispositions were so just, that the conspiracy was defeated. The court had removed from the castle of Amboise to Blois; but though that removal convinced the conspirators that their plot was discovered, it did not deter them from advancing. The Guises were informed of their routs, and cut in pieces their single parties. An officer, one Pardellian, came up with the party commanded by Renaudie, engaged him singly, and killed him, after a most obstinate resistance. In short, almost all the conspirators were either killed or taken prisoners; and their tortures, executions, and punishments lasted for some weeks.

When we consider the nature of this conspiracy, it is with ex- indefensible on the part of the delinquents, as no charge exemplary could be formed against the Guises, who were guilty only cruelty. in the apprehensions of the conspirators. However obnoxious they might be to the protestants, France certainly owed them great obligations; and the natural affection which the people there have always paid to their sovereigns, made them look upon this conspiracy as an unprovoked act of rebellion. It is certain, however, that party rage was at that time, wound up to so incredible a height in France, that even the ladies of the court, which piqued itself upon being the most polite of any in Europe, were present at the tortures and executions of the rebels, and enjoyed their dying groans. Above twelve hundred perished by the hands of executioners, and old chancellor Olivier died with grief at the horrors he beheld. In fact, whatever patriotic pretences the conspirators might hold forth, rebellion as well as religion actuated all their attempts, which were therefore inexcusable.

The prince of Conde, when the conspiracy was defeated, was at court; but though every man in France knew him to be its main spring, yet nothing could be directly proved against him. Even Renaudie's secretary, when upon the rack, could not accuse him, and when examined before the council, he spoke with so much spirit and address, that the duke of Guise himself said, that he would be his second against any man who would accept the challenge he threw out. This, however, seems to have been the effect of deep dissimulation, to prevent the protestants from breaking into open rebellion, which they probably would have done, had the prince been put to death. He was acquitted, but not daring to trust himself longer at court, he retired to his brother in Bearn. The constable had no concern in the conspiracy, the relation of which he communicated to the parliament of Paris, who called the duke of Guise "the preserver of his country". The heads of the protestants even affected joy at the defeat of the conspiracy, and the court party in their turn, pretended to believe them, by sending them letters to keep all quiet, so far as their interest and influence reached. The queen mother kept a correspondence even with admiral Coligni, in Normandy, and pressed him to give her his best advice, which he did in so unreserved a manner, that it afterwards operated to his destruction, and death. As her influence was daily gaining ground, through the king's sickly appearance, she had it then in her power to have displaced the Guises, but she must have established protestantism. She chose the middle way. She raised de l'Hospital, a man respectable for his virtue and abilities, to be chancellor of France, and he, in order to prevent the inquisition from being established in his country, sealed the decree of Romertin, by which bishops were to judge of heresy, and the civil magistrate to punish it without appeal. The Guises, at this time, lost one of their supports by the death of the queen regent of Scotland, and l'Hospital proposed holding an assembly of the nobility, (or as they are called notables) at Fontainebleau. This meeting was very august, and the king was surrounded by a new body guard, that had been raised by the duke of Guise. This gave offence, and the constable threatened to hang every every man of them, as obstructing the communication between the king and his subjects. The duke of Guise, and his brother, the cardinal, upon opening the assembly, inveighed, with great spirit and some justice, against the civil principles of the protestants, which, as they alledged, were levelled against the regal authority; but admiral Coligni, who had been always a strong advocate for the toleration of protestants, even before he declared himself to be of that persuasion, presented a petition in their behalf, which was seconded by the bishops of Valens and Vienne, who called for a national council to regulate the affairs of religion, then over-run with ignorance and superstition.

All they could obtain, was, a cessation of the persecution of the protestants till the approaching spring, when an assembly of the states should be called, which by the intrigues of the Guises, was appointed to be at Orleans. From the complexion of the French history, at this time, it appears, that the protestants considered this resolution as a triumph over their antagonists, and they made dispositions accordingly; but they were disappointed by the moderation of the king of Navarre, who frustrated an attempt made upon Lyons by his brother, the prince of Conde. The inhabitants were well affected to the court, and the king was surrounded by his new guards; considerations which daunted many of the protestants. They offered to bring twenty thousand men into the field if the king of Navarre would head them; and the court party spared no arts, even to the bribing their mistresses, to prevail with him and his brother the prince of Conde, to appear at Orleans. Full of confidence, and the strength of their friends, they rejected all solicitations to absent themselves from the assembly; but as soon as they appeared in Orleans, the king of Navarre was confined to his lodging, and the prince of Conde sent to prison as a criminal. Commissioners were named for trying him as such. He appealed to his peers assembled in the parliament of Paris; but his appeal was rejected, and he was sentenced to die. The chancellor l'Hospital refused to sign his sentence till he had time to deliberate; but the count de Sancerre positively refused to sign it at all. No legal hold could be laid upon the king of Navarre, and the Guises persuaded the king to send for him, and to treat him roughly, so as that he might lose his temper, and give them some pretext for dispatching him on the spot. The king's moderation disappointed them; and the queen mother did not think proper to gratify them by beheading him privately without any process or trial.

The princess of Conde petitioned the king for her husband's life, but her petition was rejected with a rudeness saved by which an absolute compliance with the will of the Guises alone could dictate. The death of the king proved decisive of the fate of the two princes. He was taken ill, while king. under under the hands of his barber, who was dressing his hair. His case being pronounced to be desperate, the Guises again importuned the queen mother for the heads of the two princes. Though she was inaccessible to remorse or pity, she took time to deliberate, and in the mean while, she consulted with Hospital. He convinced her that so violent a measure would unite the French nation against her; and that the only way to render the Guises dependent upon her, was to suspend the fate of the king and his brother. She followed his advice; but was careful to make both princes sensible that they owed their lives to her moderation and friendship for their persons. While the king was on his death-bed, she sent for the king of Navarre, and obliged him to resign all his pretences to the regency, during the ensuing minority, and that he, and his brother, should be reconciled to the Guises. He agreed to both conditions, but to the latter with reluctance; and then the young king, who had taken all the severity shewn to the Navarre family upon himself, expired on the fifth of December, after reigning seventeen months, and living seventeen years, and ten months.

Character of Francis II. Little can be said of the character of Francis II. If he had a will of his own, it was sanguinary, and had his life been prolonged, his reign would probably have been bloody. The queen mother, and the Guises, were so much embarrassed at the time of his death, that had it not been for his domestics, who gave it a covering, his body must have been exposed on the streets.

Charles IX.

The queen mother sides with the protestants.

THE countenance of the constable, who did not approve of the measures of the late reign, was necessary for the support of the government under this prince. He was between ten and eleven years of age at the time of his accession to the throne. Parties were so critically balanced, that the constable found no difficulty, when he came to the court at Orleans, in breaking the king's new guards. He, the duke of Guise, and the marshal St. Andre, who was in high reputation with the Roman catholic party, soon felt the despotic power the queen mother had acquired, and united to watch it. Sensible of this, she shewed a favourable countenance to the protestants. The king of Navarre was nominated lieutenant general of the kingdom, the prince of Conde was declared to be innocent, and an assembly of the states was opened on the thirteenth of December 1560. Their resolutions were favourable to the liberties of the Gallican church, and admiral Coligni presented a fresh petition in favour of the protestants; but the interest of the

Roman

Roman catholics was so prevalent, that after long debates, an edict passed, that they should not assemble in the exercise of their religion, even without arms, under pain of death, in the year 1561. The queen mother, in consequence of her new connections, moderated the severity of this edict; but every incident, that now happened about the court of France, proceeded from dissimulation.

The prince of Conde seemed to be in friendship with the Guises, though he was making preparations to destroy them. The king of Navarre pretended great zeal for the public, but in reality he was immersed in pleasure and indolence; and though a protestant in his heart, he headed the papists. The queen mother enjoyed the most despotic exercise of power; but refused the invidious title of regent. The Guises knew that her favouring the protestants was a measure far from her heart, and did nothing to oppose her; but they advised the young queen dowager, by all means, to repair to her native kingdom of Scotland; which she did, though with some difficulty. They pretended to the German princes, that they were by no means averse to Lutheranism; though they were to Calvinism, and they thereby obtained a neutrality from the duke of Wurtemberg, and others, during the bloody contest, for which both parties were preparing. The constable, Montmorency, was contented to act a second part under the king of Navarre; and, however he might approve of the religious tenets of the protestants, he thought their principles in civil affairs dangerous. By this time, the prince of Conde had driven the queen mother from her moderation; but so exquisitely did she dissemble, that in an assembly of the states that met at Pontoise, the clergy raised a large contribution to the crown, and agreed to a solemn disputation, which was to be managed, on the part of the Roman catholics, by the cardinal of Lorraine, and on that of the protestants, by Theodore Beza, at Poissy. Both combatants had their seconds; but, as usual, the disputations aggravated, instead of reconciling, matters, and the affair of religion was left more undetermined than ever.

But this conference, though ineffectual, as to religion, had great consequences, with regard to civil matters. The king offered to procure a divorce between the king of Navarre and his wife, on account of heresy, and to give him in marriage their niece, the queen of Scots, and like- wise to procure him from the king of Spain, the restitution of his kingdom. This won him entirely to the party of the Guises; and on pretence that the protestants were not agreed among themselves, as to the true religion, he professed himself a firm Roman catholic. His defection did not damp the prince of Conde, who was soon at the head of four thousand horse, and eight thousand foot, commanded, under him, by the admiral, and his brother, d'Andelot. The queen queen mother still continued her dissimulation, and had granted, under the name of a pacification, the exercise of their worship to the hugonots, and that pacification proved the source of a bloody war. The duke of Guise happening to pass with his retinue through Passy, or Vassy, a little town, the inhabitants insulted some protestants, who were at their devotions in a barn, and a skirmish ensued. The duke interposing, was wounded in the face, with a stone, and about sixty hugonots being killed, the party construed this scuffle into a breach of the pacification, and all France was soon in arms. The triumvirate, by whom is meant the constable, the duke of Guise, and the marshal St. Andre, (for the name of the king of Navarre was all that was of importance about him) carried the king from Fontainebleau to Paris, and thereby prevented their falling into the prince of Conde's hands, which the queen mother would have preferred to her being now reduced, as she was, under the power of the triumvirate. She kept, however, her private correspondence with the prince of Conde, and gained over the king of Navarre to mediate between him and the triumvirate. A kind of a compromise was accordingly made, and the Guises, and the constable agreed to lay down their arms, if the prince of Conde would do the like; and to leave the king entirely in the hands of the queen mother and the king of Navarre.

The prince of Conde, encouraged by the queen mother, who wished above all things to see the triumvirate reduced, broke this compromise, on pretence, that his party would not suffer him to observe it. He took possession of Orleans, Bourges, Lyons, Poitiers, Tours, Angiers, Angoulême, Rouen, Dieppe, Havre de Grace, and other places. By his agents, he concluded a treaty with queen Elizabeth, and put into her hands Havre de Grace, (called by the English Newhaven) by way of deposit, for the supplies she was to furnish to him and his party. His activity was not greater than that of the catholic party, headed, in appearance, by the king of Navarre, as lieutenant-general, but in reality, by the duke of Guise. The marshal St. Andre retook Poitiers, as the king of Navarre did Bourges. That prince then besieged Rouen, which his troops stormed and plundered; but he himself was mortally wounded, and died in a month.

Dreux.

By this time, the marshal St. Andre, had rejoined the army of the triumvirate, which was now commanded by the constable. The prince of Conde marched towards Normandy, and both armies met at Dreux, a city in the isle of France, about forty miles from Paris. The hugonot army consisted of eight thousand foot, and four thousand horse, under the prince of Conde, admiral Coligni, and his brother d'Andelot. Thirteen thousand foot, and three thousand dragoons, or gens d'armes, composed the catholic army, the first line of which was commanded by the marshal St. Andre,

Andre, the second by the constable, and the last by the duke of Guise. The constable was so eager for the sole honour of the day, that he charged precipitately, and in such a direction that he could not be supported, so that he was wounded, defeated, and made a prisoner. The duke of Guise had the glory of repairing his error, rallied the broken troops, and falling on the hugonots, while they were intent on plunder, gained the victory, and took the prince of Conde prisoner, but with the loss of the marshal St. Andre, who was killed in the pursuit. Coligni, however, brought off the horse, and the remains of the foot, by a most masterly retreat.

The victory of Dreux, rendered the duke of Guise more than ever the darling of the French Roman catholics. The queen mother was now unable to check him, and she was thought to be little better than a hugonot; but the duke of Savoy took advantage of that civil war, and recovered his country from the French, while Metz, Toul, and Verdun, were in the utmost danger of falling into the hands of the emperor. The duke of Guise laid siege to Orleans; the reduction of which would have given a mortal blow to the adverse party; but during the siege he was stabbed in the back and killed, by one Poltrou, a hugonot fanatic, who thought he was doing God good service by the murder. If we except his ambition, and his zeal for the Roman catholic religion, this duke was inferior to no man of his age in the accomplishments both of mind and person. He was so fortunate in all he undertook, that the troops thought themselves invincible under his command. The assassin being put to the torture, to discover his accomplices, at first named the prince of Conde, the admiral, and Theodore Beza, and other chief of the protestants; but he varied so much in his accounts that no regard was had to his discovery. The admiral even desired the queen mother to suspend his execution till they could be confronted together; but he was torn to pieces by horses, before he could retract his confession. The queen mother was far from being displeased with the duke of Guise's death, because sensible that the party was resolved to deprive her of her power, if not of her life. The prince of Conde was exchanged for the constable, and those two great men had a conference together about an accommodation, by the queen mother's order, but they disagreed; and marshal Brisac was sent to conduct the siege of Orleans.

The queen mother continued to be indefatigable in her endeavours to put an end to the civil war. At last, she was successful, by granting to the protestants a general pardon, and liberty of conscience; for which they agreed to lay down their arms, to give up the places they had taken, and to renounce their alliance with England. The English were then in possession of Havre de Grace, and queen Elizabeth refusing to give it up, war was formally declared between the two nations. The prince of Conde had a promise from the queen mother, of being made lieutenant-general. The siege of Havre was formed by him and the constable, and carried on with so much unanimity, all parties uniting against the English, that the earl of Warwick, who commanded the garrison, was obliged, after a brave defence, to surrender the place, on the twenty-eighth of July 1563. The king was then thirteen years and a day old. The parliament of Paris would not admit him to be of age, but the parliament of Rouen did, and he there held his first bed of justice; and there his mother, upon her knees, surrendered her commission as regent. Odet de Chatillon, cardinal bishop of Beauvois, assisted at this assembly. He had been struck out of the list of cardinals, for having embraced the protestant religion, and had taken a wife, who likewise was present, and sat near the king and queen, under the title of countess of Beauvois; but it is very remarkable, that her husband appeared in his cardinal's habit.

The inexpressible miseries which France had suffered during the late civil war, had rendered the return of peace extremely agreeable to all parties. Some regard was now paid to order and decency, which had been entirely banished in the struggle for power; for, in reality, the war was no other. The ambition of the prince of Conde had made him renounce the Roman catholic religion; but he was now so agreeably flattered by the queen mother, that he returned to his popish connections, and partook of all the diversions of the court, which were wicked, luxurious, and abandoned beyond expression.

The family of Guise demand justice.

The family of Guise endeavoured to repossess the importance they had lost by the late duke's death, and the cardinal of Lorraine still continued to have great interest at court. The late duke of Guise had, upon his death-bed, recommended to his family forgiveness of his death, and all injuries; but his wife and children now threw themselves, in deep mourning at the feet of the king, to implore his justice against the duke's murderers, among whom, the admiral was named. He denied the charge, and the matter remained undecided, the king reserving it for his own cognizance. The queen mother had then more power than ever, as she had the king her son's sanction for all she did. She began to abate in her complaisance to the protestants, whom she hated; and they, in return, were not sparing in their reflections upon her person and conduct.

In short, it appears, that from the time of her son's being declared of age, she had laid a deep plan for their extirpation, in which she was to be assisted by the pope, the king of Spain, and the duke of Savoy. His holiness pressed the parliament parliament of Paris to receive the decrees of the council of Trent, which it did in matters of faith and doctrine, but not of discipline and government; and it was thought the cardinal of Lorraine was not displeased at seeing the liberties of the of the Gallican church preserved; because, in case of a revolution in religion, he stood a fair chance of being created patriarch of France. The marshal Brisac, one of the worthiest men, and ablest generals, in France, was now dead, and, in point of power, the queen mother was now without a rival; but stood in need of great caution and management in the conduct of government. She secretly wished for the extermination of the protestants; she saw that they had lost the friendship and good opinion of Elizabeth, and that the latter had committed an irreparable fault in not having the treaty of Chateau-Cambresis confirmed when the king was at age. She considered, at the same time, that if she should call in the king of Spain to her assistance, she might rekindle a civil war, which might end in giving to France a new master. She therefore rejected all proposals of that kind; but foreseeing that matters must come to extremities with the protestants, she carried the king in a progress round great part of his kingdom, not only to see how his subjects stood affected towards the catholic religion, but to order several new fortresses, particularly one at Lyons, to be built. She intended to have had an interview in Lorraine with the emperor of Germany; but in that she was disappointed by the vigilance of Philip king of Spain. Upon her return to Paris, she found a negotiation was far advanced between her son's ministers, and those of Elizabeth, and that the capitulation of Havre was carried into a definitive treaty. This left the queen mother at liberty to pursue her schemes with the greater freedom against the protestants.

When she was at Roussillon, in Dauphiny, where they Treachery. abounded, she published an edict, prohibiting the protestants from the exercise of their religion within thirty miles court of of the court. This was followed by a train of measures France. that discovered a wicked, but a deep, policy. Notwithstanding the immense sums which Philip II. lavished all over Europe, he could not prevent her making an alliance with the Swiss cantons; and the newly cemented alliance between her and Elizabeth gathered strength every day. The protestants then looked upon the prince of Conde as having betrayed them. The admiral, and his brother, were the only two great men of their party, who had not assisted at the siege of Havre, and their putting that place into the hands of the English had rendered them more odious than ever to the Roman catholics. Charles was bred up from his earliest infancy in the most rooted aversion to their persons and principles; and had for his companions the duke of Guise, and the lords of his faction. Montmorenci, son to the the constable, declared for neither party, and being governor of the isle of France, he disarmed the numerous attendants of the cardinal of Lorraine, as he was about to enter Paris; and killed one of his pages. Both sides appealed to the court; but the queen mother managed with so much art, that her son favoured neither party, and consequently was master of both. This, and various other incidents, particularly the superiority which the French party had acquired in Scotland, contributed to the queen mother's design, which she afterwards so fatally put into execution. She carried Charles to Bayonne, where she had an interview with the queen of Spain, and the duke of Alva; but the subject of it was kept so profoundly secret, that the protestants more than suspected it was directed against them. One of Elizabeth's spies, however, discovered it, and when Charles left Bayonne, he took a progress into Bearn, where he obliged the queen of Navarre to reinstate the catholics in their churches, and to restore them to a share in the magistracy; an arrangement which he carried into execution, through all the other protestant provinces of his kingdom.

Hitherto the queen mother had preserved an appearance of moderation, as the papists were at least equally entitled with the protestants to the countenance of her son, and the execution, as well as protection, of the laws. The fixing the new year to the first of January was owing to her, and she made several other excellent regulations for the benefit of the nation. In all this she was assisted by that excellent magistrate, the chancellor l'Hospital; but he was kept in profound ignorance of all the infernal measures that were on foot against the protestants. Like an honest and wise man, he applied himself to the execution of a plan, the noblest that had ever been formed for the perfection and security of the French government.

The ordinance of Moulins published. Upon the return of the king to Paris, in the beginning of the year 1565, by his advice deputies were summoned to Moulins, from all the parliaments and head courts of justice in the kingdom; and there the famous ordinance known by the name of that place, consisting of fourscore and six articles, was received and published. This work does honour to the French legislation, both for its noble principles and its elegant composition. At the same time and place, the quarrel between Montmorenci, and the cardinal of Lorraine, and that between the admiral and the duke of Guise, were seemingly compromised, but in reality only skinned over. The queen mother's exquisite dissimulation, led her to make confidants of the prince of Conde, and the admiral. She complained to them of the conduct of Philip, who was intriguing in all the courts of Europe, to the diminution of her son's credit; and that, at the same time, he was was practising upon the Roman catholic party, in France, for the destruction of the protestants. To give them a farther proof of her rectitude, she even went so far as to reduce the expences of the court and army. At the same time, she dispatched a trusty agent to inform Philip that he needed to take no umbrage at the countenance she shewed to the heads of the hugonots, as she did it only to bring them the more securely and easily within her toils. All her management, however, could not blind the admiral; and, by his advice, the prince of Conde insisted with the queen mother, that troops should be raised to oppose the duke of Alva, who was marching from Italy at the head of a great army, under pretence of quelling the commotions in the Low Countries; but might enter France, which he would find unprovided to receive him. The queen seemed to listen with great complacency to his representations, and gave orders for raising six thousand Swiss; whom, in reality, she intended to employ not against the Spaniards, but the protestants.

The constable, Montmorenci, continued still to observe a kind of neutrality towards all parties, and finding it impracticable to resign his place to his son, he offered it to the prince of Conde; but the duke of Anjou, brother to the king, declared himself his rival. This palpable evasion of the king's request, at last entirely opened his eyes. He became sensible that the queen mother had been all along dissembling, and that he and his party stood tottering on the brink of ruin. The march of the duke of Alva into the Low Countries, had forced the prince of Orange, who had discovered the deep laid designs against the protestants, to fly into Germany, while the counts Egmont, and Horn, were made prisoners, and all the Low Countries were filled with the most bloody executions, not only of the protestants, but of all who had dared to murmur against the Spanish tyranny.

The success of the duke of Alva encouraged the queen mother to be less reserved towards the French hugonots. In 1566, Charles expressed himself to be displeased with the countenance which they had received from the German princes, or that they should dare to interfere in affairs between him and them. The prince of Conde, and the admiral, being again united, re-acted the part which had been attempted at Amboise. The court lay then at Monceaux, with a very slight guard, and it was agreed that the protestants should, with all imaginable secrecy, repair in arms to Rosoy, at a small distance, from whence they were to surprize the court. It happened fortunately that the count of Castelnau was then on his return from the Low Countries, where he had been executing a commission with the duke of Alva. He fell in with some protestants, by whom he discovered the conspiracy, and the king, and queen mother, escaped to Meaux, of which the constable Montmorenci, who did not believe Castelnau's intelligence, was governor. Being arrived at Meaux, the six thousand Swiss under Pfiffer, who who lay in the neighbourhood, marched thither by the king's order in the night-time. On Michaelmas-Day, when the conspiracy was to have been executed, the meeting of the protestants was so numerous at Rosoy, that they might still have surprized Meaux, had they not suffered themselves to be amused ; but the Swiss coming up, their colonel undertook to escort the court to Paris, though he had no horse ; which he accordingly performed with great courage and conduct, his march being all the way skirted by the conspirators, who were strong in cavalry. This brave action of that body was rewarded with a present of a month's pay to every man.

The escape of the court was far from daunting the prince of Conde. He knew that queen Elizabeth had lately demanded the rendition of the town of Calais, which being flatly refused, had given the cardinal of Beauvais, who had secretly repaired to her court, encouragement to hope that she would assist the protestants. The springs of the events that followed have never been sufficiently discovered, through the impenetrable conduct of the queen mother. It is however, certain, that the prince of Conde acted with so much fury, that he gave the most moderate among his own party very disagreeable apprehensions of his designs. It is said, that he even coined money with the title of "Lewis XIII. the first Christian king of France ;" but it is doubtful whether those pieces (many of which are still extant) were struck by his order, or by the zeal of his fanatical friends. It is no wonder if such excesses reduced his army to three thousand men, with whom he surprized the town of St. Dennis, and burnt down the windmills that were in the neighbourhood of Paris, which he kept blocked up for six weeks. During that time, the queen mother, by the specious concessions she offered to make, had quieted the minds of many of the chief hugonots, but had dispatched Castelnau afresh to the duke of Alva, to prevail with him to march a body of Spanish foot to Senlis, where they were to be joined by some French troops; that the prince having them in his rear, and the constable, whose army consisted of eighteen thousand men, in the front, might be utterly defeated.

St. Dennis.

The duke of Alva excused himself from sending the troops required, because the queen of England's fleet was then threatening a descent upon the Low Countries. Upon Castelnau's return with this refusal, the constable made dispositions for attacking the prince, who was far from declining an engagement, though he had but twelve hundred foot, and fifteen hundred horse, and the Battle of St. Dennis was fought on the tenth of November: It lasted for several hours, and all the catholics could do, notwithstanding the vast superiority of their numbers, was to carry away

the name of victors. His body was carried off by his son and some of his friends, and he died in Paris four days after, with equal resolution and piety. He was undoubtedly one of the worthiest men that ever was about any court; and he came at last to be one of the wisest. He had great private failings, being morose, and intractable, but they were, perhaps, owing to his knowledge of the worthless characters of all parties. He piqued himself upon being the first Christian baron in christendom, and upon his steady loyalty to the crown. Though he professed the Roman catholic religion, yet he always was for moderate measures, and therefore disliked the Guises. He took up arms in the last scene of his life chiefly from the indignation he conceived against the prince of Conde's excesses. Though the queen mother was far from being displeased at his death, yet his body was interred with royal honours in the church of Notre Dame, at Paris.

The affairs of the protestants would have been now desperate, had not the admiral been the most fruitful in expedients of any man in his time. Supported by the favourable reception which queen Elizabeth had given their agents, he had bargained for ten thousand German troops, who were to enter France under prince Casimir, son to the elector palatine, and to join the remains of the hugonot army in Lorraine. Their junction was accordingly formed at Pont a Mousson, at which place, the hugonot army arrived in the most deplorable want of every thing, even to shoes and stockings. The prince of Conde had promised the auxiliaries a hundred thousand crowns; but he himself had scarce money to buy the necessaries of life. Such, however, was the zeal of his party, that they collected all the money that was left them, to give it to their mercenaries, which, with the reliance they had on Elizabeth's assurances, stilled their clamours, but at the expence of the country, which was most miserably depopulated for their subsistence.

The politics of the queen mother were over refined. Instead of giving the Roman catholic army, after the death of the constable, an able head to command it, she persuaded her son to declare the duke of Anjou his lieutenant-general. That prince, though brave, was young and unexperienced, and being sent at the head of the army to harass that of the enemy, the miseries of the country were increased, by his troops every where plundering, massacring, or executing the hugonots.

In the beginning of February 1568, the hugonot and German army, by forced marches, arrived before Chartres, which they besieged. The prince of Conde had always the weakness to be accessible to proposals for treating; and notwithstanding all the remonstrances of the admiral, he swallowed the bait thrown out to him by the queen mother, as Chartres was on the point of surrendering. A treaty was accordingly concluded; by which the pacification formerly agreed on was renewed, and rendered perpetual, and general throughout the kingdom. The places taken on both sides were to be restored, and the king engaged to pay the arrears due to the Germans. It was plain to all France, that the queen mother never intended to observe that peace, and that she had concluded it, only to save Chartres, and thereby to prevent her son and herself being driven out of Paris; and the people, immediately on its being declared at Longjumeau, called it the Little Peace. After all, the prince of Conde was not indefensible in concluding it. His German auxiliaries were every day threatening to mutiny; the protestant cause was to appearance ruined in the Low Countries; the money of Philip had gained him a strong party in Germany; two thousand Spanish foot, under the count of Aremberg, were marching against him from the Low Countries, and he had received little or no money from Elizabeth, who had paid to the elector palatine all she had engaged for. Surrounded by so many difficulties, it was no wonder that the prince of Conde agreed to the peace, which was no other than a smothering of the war. It was, however, so agreeable to the court, that the king borrowed a hundred and eighty thousand crowns from the republic of Venice, and the princes of Italy, to discharge the German arrears.

But is
broken.

The protestants were so much convinced of the inefficacy of the peace, that most of them refused to render up the towns they were possessed of; and Rochelle, in particular, shut its gates against the king's troops. For six months, the same disturbances prevailed all over France as in time of declared war. The fields were uncultivated; the open towns reduced to heaps of ruins; assassinations and executions filled every corner of their cities and fortified places; and, according to the accounts of those who lived at the time, both the public and private miseries of France were inexpressible. The queen mother thought only of her own security, and admitted to her secret council only Lewis la Lansae, who was then chancellor; John de Marvilliere, bishop of Orleans, Sebastian de l'Aubespine, bishop of Limoges; Henry de Mesme, the president of Biragne; and Villeroy, the secretary of state. The great subject of their deliberations was to get into their hands the heads of the hugonots, who still held out, and to reduce their towns. A vast number of executions of the hugonots were every day performing, and the queen mother pretended that their crimes did not consist in their religion, to which she was not at all averse, but in their treasonable practices against the state.

state. Intelligence arriving that the admiral and his brother, had paid a visit to the prince of Conde, marshal de Tavannes had an order, to make them both prisoners, if possible. He is said to have apprized them of their danger, and it is said certain, they saved themselves by flying to Rochelle, from whence d'Andelot went over in a sailor's habit to England, to solicit succours from queen Elizabeth.

The marshal de Tavannes's party defeated an officer, who had been left with a few men to cover the prince's retreat, and the queen mother lost her usual moderation, when she heard, that the scheme had miscarried. Suspecting that the chancellor was in the secret, she displaced him, and the seals were given to the bishop of Orleans; but the protestant cause seemed now to revive. Queen Elizabeth opened her kingdom as a retreat for all the persecuted hugonots, and the informations which she received from the prince of Conde, as to the state of protestantism on the continent, were so important, that notwithstanding her natural frugality, she lent him a hundred thousand angels, ammunition, and a large train of artillery. The vast advantage which Rochelle, in point of situation, independency, and riches, had over any other city belonging to the hugonots, rendered it their head quarters. Thither the queen of Navarre carried her son, young Henry, prince of Bearn, afterwards the glorious Henry IV. and he was received as their head. D'Andelot collected the troops beyond the Loire, and carried them to Rochelle. The queen mother, as usual, had recourse to negotiating. In the winter, she made offers to the prince of Conde, who had now marched with an army to Soissons, but the negotiation came to nothing. The royal army under the duke of Anjou was excellently well officered. The marshal de Tavannes was second general in command. The marshal de Cofse, and Biron, who was afterwards a marshal, served in the same army, and in a council of war it was resolved to fight the prince of Conde, before he could be joined by a body of German auxiliaries, whom he had taken into pay upon the queen of England's credit. They came up with him on the thirteenth of March, at a little village called Jarnac, belonging to the district of Rochelle, in Angoulesme. The prince of Conde, had by accident broke his leg a day or two before; but found he could not avoid fighting. A battle ensued, in which the duke of Anjou, or rather the marshal de Tavannes, was victorious, fourteen hundred of the hugonots, and two hundred of the royalists being killed. The prince of Conde, after fighting with the utmost resolution and intrepidity, was wounded and taken prisoner; but being carried to a little distance from the field, he was shot through the head by the baron de Montesquieu.

If we take the character of this prince from the historians of the time, his body was a contrast to his mind, which was as accomplished as the other was contemptible.

If we consult facts, and rely on the truth of history, without being swayed by partial or prepossessed, authorities; all that can be allowed him is valour, dissimulation, and activity in forming a party. His conduct towards queen Elizabeth was impolitic and indefensible, and his weakness for women, rendered him perpetually the dupe of the queen mother, who had always about her court syrens, as they were called, to charm secrets out of her enemies. One madame Limaie, had an ascendancy over the prince of Conde, which was of great service to the court; and to this foible was owing his inconstancy, and the perpetual facility he discovered in being amused with negotiations. Upon his death, the admiral took the command of the army, and made a most admirable retreat into Poitou, after throwing garrisons into the strong places held by his party.

The protestant cause declines.

The duke of Deux Ponts, was a German prince, who had engaged in the protestant cause, and had begun his march to join the prince of Conde's army, when the battle of Jarnac was fought. It was the month of May before his junction was effected with the admiral, who besieged Poitiers. The place was defended by the duke of Guise, whose accomplishments, both civil and military, equalled, if not excelled, those of his father. Every action and measure now proved adverse to the protestants. Though the admiral was brave, cool, and possessed almost of every quality of a great and a good man, and though he had more than once saved the protestant army by the excellent retreats he made, yet he was unequal to the command in chief. The brave defence made by the duke of Guise enabled the duke of Anjou to besiege Chastelleraut; upon which, the admiral, who had lost four thousand men, raised the siege of Poitiers; and he, the vidame of Chartres, with the count of Montgomery were declared rebels by the parliament. He was afterwards beaten by the duke of Anjou at St. Cler, and on the third of October he lost the battle of Montcontour in Poitou, which he was obliged to fight, through a mutiny of his German troops. His men behaved ill in this battle, and he lost all his baggage and artillery. The glory arising from the action was acquired by Tavannes, and the protestant cause seemed to be expiring, when the victorious army besieged St. Jean d'Angeli.

Piles commanded the garrison, and the defence he made was equal to the importance of his trust, upon which the very existence of the protestant cause in France depended. The king, and queen mother came to the siege, and orders were given to storm the place, but the besiegers were beat off, and it was resolved to reduce it by famine. This had its effect, and on the second of December, Piles, to prevent his garrison from perishing, made dispositions for forcing his way through the enemy's army, after again and again re-

fuling to treat with so faithless a crew as the royalists were. Biron interposed, and Piles having a good opinion of him, he took his word for the performance of the capitulation, which was honourable; and he marched out with nine hundred men, the remains of two thousand. The repeated, and seemingly mortal, blows, which the protestants had received, did not discourage the admiral, nor the heads of his party. The vidame of Chartres, who was in England, prevailed on queen Elizabeth to advance a considerable sum on the queen of Navarre's jewels; and, that she might gain some breathing time to the protestants, she encouraged a proposal of marriage, which had been made on the part of the queen mother, between her, and the duke of Anjou. The incomparable queen of Navarre suffered her son to be present in the most hazardous actions; and it was in that unfortunate army of the protestants, that Henry the Great was initiated in the art of war.

The protestant cause, which was thought to be expiring, but is revived by Rochelle had been long blocked up both by sea and land; but queen Elizabeth. Sore, a protestant pirate, that is, one who subsisted by plundering his enemies, after they had left him no other way of living, forced the blockade by sea. De la Noue, an excellent hugonot officer, beat the catholics by land. The count of Montgomery raised as much money upon the estates of the royalists, about Tholouse, as paid the German mercenaries in his army, and was joined by the prince of Bearn, and the young prince of Conde, after a hazardous and difficult march, with a considerable body of horse and foot. They threw a bridge over the Gironne, in order to besiege Bordeaux; but it was broken down by Monluc, and the protestant army was again in danger of perishing, if the admiral had not undertaken to march twelve hundred miles at its head, to join a fresh body of German auxiliaries. The march was difficult, fatiguing, and dangerous beyond expression. They plundered fifty towns, houses, and villages, and laid a hundred under contribution; and they marched as far as Arnai le-Duc, in Burgundy, before they were stopt by the marshal de Cossé, at the head of the duke of Anjou's army, who was then indisposed. De Cossé had with him ten thousand good troops, and a train of artillery. The protestants had not with them a single cannon, and their numbers did not exceed four thousand; but the admiral made so excellent a disposition, that he beat the marshal, though he durst not pursue him, and continued his march, which pointed towards Paris.

The negotiations between the court and the protestants were all this while carrying on, with equal dissimulation, perhaps, on both sides, but with less treachery on that of the protestants. The latter demanded terms that were due only to a victorious party. The queen mother advised her son to grant them, and a peace was signed on the eighth of August, at St. Germain-en Laye. By this peace, the protestants were to retain possession, for two years, of Rochelle, la Charite, Montauban, and Coignac, the four most important places they had in France. They were reinvested in all their estates, places, and dignities; all edicts, to their prejudice, were recalled, and all in their favour, confirmed. The truth is, Charles, though no more than twenty years of age, outwitted the admiral, one of the most clear sighted noblemen of his time. He pretended that he had emancipated himself from the fascinating power of the queen mother, and the Guises, who wanted to render him subservient to Spain, and that he was resolved to reign in the hearts of all his subjects. The admiral believed him, and the deception was favoured by every measure of the king, who gave orders for performing the articles of the treaty with the most scrupulous punctuality. His dissimulation went so far, that it imposed upon the Guises, and the court of Spain, till they were undeceived by the queen mother; and the public expected a sudden alteration of affairs, especially in point of religion.

Preparations for the massacre of St. Bartholomew.

The marriage between Charles and Elizabeth of Austria, the daughter of the emperor Maximilian II. which had been long in dependence, now took place, at Meziers; and other great espousals were in agitation. Don Sebastian, king of Portugal, by his ambassador, courted the princess Margaret, sister to Charles, who perceiving that she had an intrigue with the duke of Guise, drove him from his court; and, to cool the king's fury, either affected or real, he married another lady. Charles then declared that he intended to give his sister in marriage to the prince of Bearn; and he appeared, at this time, so much the object of his peoples love and reverence, so much esteemed and courted by foreign powers, that there was the greatest reason to believe that the sentiments he had adopted were real, as they were attended with so much lustre and happiness. He even refused, for fear of giving offence to the protestants, to renew his family's favourite league with the Turks. He approved of the admiral supporting, against Spain, the protestant cause in the Low Countries; and he engaged him to send count Lodowick, of Nassau, the prince of Orange's brother, to him, in disguise, that he might more safely confer with him about certain points for the interests of the Orange family, and the protestant religion. The count accordingly attended him, and Charles planted in his mind such a conviction of his sincerity, as won over the admiral to be of the same opinion, and he repaired to court with only fifty gentlemen to attend him. He was charmed with the conversation of the king, who had great natural talents, and discoursed better than any man in his dominions could, of his true interests, especially in supporting the protestants in the Low Countries against the power of Spain. He loaded the admiral with with the most affectionate careſſes. He called him his father, and re-eſtabliſhed him in all his penſions. The admiral had leave to retire to his houſe at Chatillon, and he went backwards and forwards to court without any constraint, while the king was heaping new favours on his head. In ſhort, the eccleſiaſtics who were not in the ſecret thought the king was on the point of declaring himſelf a proteſtant, and the houſe of Guiſe trembled at his art and abilities.

The time approaching when the great blow was to be ſtruck, the queen of Navarre, and her ſon the prince of Bearn, were invited to court, on pretence of the latter's propoſed marriage with the king's ſiſter. The queen, though a lady of great penetration, was, with the reſt of the party, impoſed upon by Charles, who, together with his mother, met her at Blois, and overpowered her with marks of their tenderneſs and reſpect. At night the king aſked his mother, whether he had not played his part well, and on her adviſing him to perſevere, he answered, that he would bring them all into his net. In a few days the queen of Navarre died; but tho' the enemies of Charles, and his mother, pretended that ſhe was poiſoned, that charge is fully refuted by the heads of the party remaining ſtill at court after her body had been opened, when it appeared that her death was occaſioned by an abſceſs; but notwithſtanding the incredible diſſimulation of Charles and his mother, the plain and ſenſible part of the proteſtants, who underſtood nothing of courtly refinements, apprehended ſome dreadful cataſtrophe, and ſent repeated intimations to the admiral and his friends to beware. They were laughed at for their ſimplicity, and many of them left the court, becauſe, as they ſhrewdly obſerved, it treated them too well. Charles heard of their apprehenſions, and ſought to efface them by entering into their concerns in a manner ſo ſerious, that he could not be ſuſpected of duplicity. He more than performed all that he had promiſed to the family of Orange, and he employed Teligni, one of the moſt promiſing young gentlemen in France, and lately married to the admiral's daughter, to bring his father-in-law to court, which he did, that he might conſult him concerning a declaration of war againſt Spain, and the march of the troops towards the Low Countries. He gave him, about the ſame time, a year's revenue of the eccleſiaſtical livings of his brother, the cardinal, who was now dead.

On the ſeventeenth of Auguſt, that Charles might put his ſincerity out of doubt with the moſt ſcrupulous, the marriage ceremony between the prince of Bearn, who, by his mother's death, was king of Navarre, and the princeſs Margaret, was performed by the cardinal of Bourbon. She was ſo averſe to the marriage, that ſhe reſuſed to give her conſent, by words, but her brother, who ſtood behind her, forced her to give a nod, which was held valid. The rejoicings joicings at the marriage held for three days; and on the twenty-second of August, when the admiral was returning to court, a gun was discharged at him from a window, which struck off one of his fingers, and wounded him in the arm. This assassination had almost destroyed all the deep laid schemes of the king. The admiral himself was startled, his friends advised him to leave Paris, and offered, if he was stopt, to carry him out of it by force. A visit which Charles paid him in the afternoon dissipated all his apprehensions, if he had any; but the accident alarmed the queen mother so much, that she resolved, now, to lose no time, in striking the long meditated blow.

Its execution.

The duke of Anjou, who, young as he was, was almost as exquisite a dissembler as his brother, the duke of Nevers, the grand prior, who was natural brother to the king, the duke of Guise, the marshal de Tavannes, and the count de Retz, were called to council by the queen mother; and the eve of St. Bartholomew's day was pitched on for a general massacre of all the protestants in France; the most horrid fact, (all circumstances considered) that is, perhaps, to be met with in history. At first, it was resolved to have included the marshals Montmorenci, and d'Amville, in the number of the proscribed, only for favouring the hugonots; but, they were saved at the request of the duke of Nevers, and Tavannes; and the execution of the massacre within Paris was committed to the duke of Guise, while orders were sent for the protestants undergoing the like massacre through all the cities and provinces of France. So execrable and bloody a design, formed by a woman whom the protestants had never provoked, and by a young prince, bred up in a court, where love and luxury were the only arts that were cultivated, have induced some writers to pretend, that Charles felt remorse, immediately before the execution of the massacre, but that it was stifled by his mother. Others, upon better grounds, assign to him a greater share of guilt than to her. The signal was to be the ringing of a bell at midnight. The guards and militia were put under arms, and nothing can give us a more strong picture of the detestable influence of religion, than the court's daring to entrust the execution of such a scheme, to men who could have no quarrel, but of religion, with those whom they were about to butcher. The duke of Guise, attended by a party of Swiss Roman catholic guards, his uncle the duke of Aumale, and the grand prior, upon the toll of the bell, went to the admiral's house, which they forced open, and one Besme, running up stairs, found him at prayers, and ran him through the body with his sword. It would disgrace the page of history to relate the indignities with which his venerable remains were treated, and which shewed an impotence of revenge beyond all credibility.

Murder of the admiral.

The

The intendant of Paris had ordered that all the windows of the city should be illuminated when they heard the fatal knell. The attendants of the king of Navarre, and the prince of Conde, who lodged in the Louvre, were massacred in presence of the king and queen mother; and Charles seeing some endeavouring to escape across the river, shot at them with his long gun. The murderers were equally busy all that night, and next day, in other parts of the city, where some thousands were massacred; but the precise number seems not to have been ascertained. It is said, that the whole number butchered in Meaux, Orleans, Troyes, Tholouse, Lyons, and Rouen, in two months, (for so long the massacre continued) amounted to thirty thousand. Some of the magistrates, however, had the spirit to refuse to obey the inhuman orders, and three of the cautionary towns given to the protestants, Rochelle, Montauban, and Coignac, opened their gates as asylums for their persecuted brethren; but la Charite was surprized by the king's troops, and its protestant inhabitants murdered.

When the first heat of this massacre was over, Charles The mas-called before him the king of Navarre and the prince of Conde, whom he had forced to be spectators of the bloody scenes in the massacre, and required them to abjure protestantism. The king not only complied, but signed an order, (which was not obeyed) prohibiting the exercise of the hugonot religion within his dominions. The prince of Conde was more obstinate, though the king told him his fate was comprized in three words, the mass, death, or the bastile. At last, he followed the example of his chaplain, who had been prevailed upon to abjure. Charles, at first, affected to lay the blame of the massacre upon the duke of Guise's over-forward zeal; but, on the twenty-eighth of August, he made a merit of his having himself been the author of the tragedy. He repaired to his parliament, where the members congratulated him upon the performance; and, by his order, the process of the dead admiral, Coligni, on pretence of his being engaged in a conspiracy to place the crown of France on the prince of Conde's head, was drawn up. The admiral was condemned, and executed in effigy. Two of his friends, Briguemaut, and Cavagnes, were tried likewise for being his accomplices, and, after conviction, they suffered death at the common place of execution. The zeal of the parliament even went so far as to order an annual commemoration of St. Bartholomew's day; but the chancellor, l'Hospital, detested it; nor was the day ever observed but with horror. The ingenious treachery and dissimulation of the court was not sufficient, however, to trepan all the objects of its fury; for the count of Montgomery escaped out of Paris to England. The house of the English ambassador, Walsingham, was ordered by Charles to be held as a sanctuary for all the English; and Walsingham thanked the king for the favour that had been shewn him. At the same time, he put his court on their guard, against the deceitful practices of Charles, who, he said, was in a secret confederacy with the king of Spain, to deprive the queen of her crown, and extirpate the protestant religion.

Strozzi was then lying with a fleet before Rochelle, and Charles sent la Houe, an officer of great reputation, and a firm protestant, to persuade the Rochellers to yield to his authority. He performed his commission with admirable address. He vehemently exhorted the citizens to submit, upon proper security being given them for the enjoyment of their religion and liberties; but that not being proposed, they raised additional fortifications, and prepared to defend themselves. Queen Elizabeth knew the importance of the place; but she had made a late treaty with France, which disabled her from giving any open assistance to the Rochellers; nor would she even suffer her subjects, who had associated themselves for that purpose, to send them succours. The French court, however, was so fully convinced of her supporting them underhand, that they threatened to send an army into Scotland under the duke of Maine. The antipathy which the protestants had conceived against the Roman catholics, since the massacre, was now arisen to such a height, that they disdained the least communication with that persuasion. The obstinacy of the court, and the zeal of the catholics, were equal to those of the protestants; and France was once more filled with blood and rapine. The marshal d'Amville reduced Sommiers, but at such an expence of troops that he could undertake nothing during the remainder of the campaign. Sancerre was besieged by le Chastre for eight months, and obtained a capitulation, after being brought to such extremity, that a father is said to have subsisted upon the dead body of his daughter, and two thousand of the besieged died of hunger. The marquis de Villars overawed the province of Guienne, and the strength of the hugonots was once more shut up in Rochelle.

Strozzi, and the baron de la Garde, commanded the siege by sea. The duke of Anjou commanded the grand army by land, and under him served the king of Navarre, the duke of Alençon, the prince of Conde, and the most experienced generals in France, with the flower of her nobility. The siege was carried on with prodigious fury. The court had come to a resolution, that as soon as Rochelle should be taken, the duke of Guise should invade England; but Walsingham discovered it by corrupting one of the Scotch ministers servants. Elizabeth dissembled her knowledge of this secret, and gave fair words to the French ambassador; but she suffered the count of Montgomery, who was still in England, to equip a fleet of privateers for the relief of the place.

It

It had sustained a vast variety of assaults, in one of which, the duke of Aumale lost his life; but it cannot be said to have been reduced to extremity, because it was not so well blocked up by sea, as to hinder the friends of the besieged from supplying them with stores and provisions of every kind. With those they were better supplied than their besiegers were, for hunger and diseases cut off four and twenty thousand of the duke of Anjou's troops.

On the nineteenth of April 1573, the count of Montgo- its advance-mercy appeared with his Squadron before Rochelle. His targeous arrival had been foreseen, and such preparations were made capitulato receive him, that he sent an agent to implore farther tion.
 succours from Elizabeth, but she refused them and treated him with great harshness. The siege was then renewed with more fury than ever, and a French gentleman, de Vigne, saved the duke of Anjou's life, by receiving in his body a shot which he saw aimed against him. While the fate of Rochelle was thus suspended, an express came from Mouluc, bishop of Valens, the French minister at Warsaw, that he had prevailed with the Polish protestants to join the French party in electing the duke of Anjou king of Poland, on condition of the Rochellers being left in possession of their liberties and religion. This brought on a treaty, which terminated in a renewal of the pacification, by which the privileges and religion of the besieged were secured; but the Rochellers were obliged to submit to the formality of inviting the duke to enter their city, which, as had been pre-concerted, he declined doing. The protestants, notwithstanding the siege was raised, remained still as mistrustful of the court as ever, because they knew all the favour that had been shewn them was extorted.

However fond the duke of Anjou might have been of his The duke new dignity, his friends soon wrought him into a dislike of of Anjou

French court was now miserably divided. Charles entertain- king of parture, nor could he forbear telling the queen mother, that one kingdom could not hold them both. The duke, on the other hand, though he had been always at the head of an army, was immersed in sensuality, a slave to the most infamous connections, and desperately in love with the princess of Conde. But those considerations were at last overcome, and he yielded to the instances of the Polish ambassadors, by setting out for that kingdom. His departure opened a vast career of ambition for the duke of Alençon, the same prince whom queen Elizabeth had so long flattered with the hopes of marrying her. He was a weak, unsteady man, but brave, treacherous and ambitious.

put himself at the head of the French patriots, or politiques, as they were called. They pretended to look on public matters; not through the medium of religion, but of patriotism and humanity; and that therefore there was a necessity of opposing all who favoured the doctrine of massacres, which plainly pointed at the king, the queen-mother and the house of Guise. The king of Navarre, and the prince of Condé, favoured this association; and the French protestants depended so much upon it, that they presented to the king a writing, containing demands, which the queen-mother said the late prince of Condé durst not have made, had he been at the head of fourscore thousand men. The court, however, did not venture to arrest the deputies who presented this bold paper, which gave the protestants fresh spirits. It had been agreed that the duke of Alençon should, with his own consent, undergo a seeming force, and then be put at the head of the hugonots; and dispositions for that purpose were far advanced; but the court discovered it, some say, by the duke's own imprudence, who revealed the whole to his mother.

The protestants all over France were then in agitation; and a party of horse had advanced as far as St. Germain, to have made the duke prisoner; but he pretended he was not ready, and they returned. The king gave orders for raising three armies; but he refused to give the post of lieutenant-general, which had been held by the duke of Anjou, to the duke of Alençon. The longer the queen-mother dived into the conspiracy, the more formidable she found it. She pressed for the consummation of the duke's marriage with queen Elizabeth, who evaded it with an art which could not impose upon the other. It is certain that Elizabeth, at that time, kept a secret correspondence with the king of Navarre, as well as the duke of Alençon; and that the conspirators were secretly encouraged by Dale, the English ambassador at the French court. Though the duke, upon his confession, was assured of life and pardon, yet he durst not trust either his mother or his brother, and he applied to the English ambassadors for a safe conduct to England; which Elizabeth, with some difficulty, granted him. It is to this day a secret by what means the queen-mother discovered the negotiation; and whether it was not by Elizabeth's secret management, as she was then on very bad terms with the court of Spain, and therefore afraid to break entirely with the French. Be that as it will, the count left Paris with the utmost precipitation; and, at Bois de Vincennes, Charles ordered the king of Navarre to be put under a strict arrest; and Wilkes, the English ambassador's secretary, who had negotiated the safe conduct, was obliged to leave France. The marshals Montmorenci and Cosse were sent prisoners to the bastile. The prince of Condé retired to his government of Strasbourg, where he abjured his abjuration of pro-protestantism, which he said had been extorted from him, and he was re-admitted to the protestant communion. La Moule, the duke of Alençon's favourite, and the same who had betrayed him, was beheaded for not having discovered enough; and some other examples of justice were made. The duke of Alençon poorly discovered all he knew; but the king of Navarre behaved with great spirit, and reproached the queen-mother with being the author of all the public calamities.

Charles was, at this time, the most miserable person of State of his dominions. The very narrow escape he had made from Charles's the late conspiracy, shewed him how great a stranger he was court. to his own affairs; that he had been all along governed by the execrable counsels of the queen-mother, whose creature Biragne, the chancellor, was; and, that the houses of Lorraine and Guise were the executioners of all her machinations. In short, that his sovereign power was engrossed by others. She had procured the post of lieutenant-general for her son-in-law, the duke of Lorraine. All the governors, officers, and magistrates in France, were ordered to obey her commands; and Biragne obtained from the king a deed, appointing her regent of the kingdom. To complete the misery of Charles, he appeared to be sensible of his own wretched situation. He threw out the most determined resolves to remove from their employments all who had either advised or executed the massacre of St. Bartholomew's day; but, from their experience of his former dissimulation, none would trust him; and he found himself under a lingering distemper, which was incurable, and threw him sometimes into such agonies as deprived him of his reason.

Perceiving that he had not above four and twenty hours His death, to live, he declared, before the king of Navarre, the duke of Alençon, the cardinal of Bourbon, the chancellor, and other great officers of state, his mother to be regent, till the arrival of his brother and successor the king of Poland; and he died on the thirtieth of May, 1574. It was publicly known, that, when the queen-mother took leave of the king of Poland in Lorraine, she bade him adieu, but assured him, that he should not be long absent from France. Charles openly declared, that he did not think the distemper which killed him was natural; and his body being opened, tho' no recent appearance of poison was found, yet the physicians thought that his intestines were worn out by a former application. This, however, was imputed to the great skill of the poisoners. Charles died at the age of twenty-four years and one month; and his mortal disease, if not supernatural, was certainly extraordinary; for it was the oozing of blood from all the pores of his body.

The court of France, during the last reign, may be said to and have been formed by the queen-mother upon a system of the most abandoned principles, both in religion and government, ment, intermingled with the vices of murder and poisoning, the weakness of forcery and judicial astrology; with every luxury that can enervate the body or debilitate the mind. Her own ruling principle was dissimulation. She taught it to her sons; and Charles proved so apt a scholar, that, before he was twenty years of age, he excelled Tiberius in dissimulation, and equalled Nero in cruelty. The fine parts, and excellent sense he possessed, contributed to his proficiency in the former; for, with all the detestable, he had all the good, qualities that a monarch could possess. He had wit, and loved the conversation of poets and learned men. He composed a treatise, which has been since published, upon hunting, his favourite diversion; and he carried to excess most of the bodily exercises, in which he excelled. He is said to have carried his dissimulation with him to the grave; and, that, though he appeared to be reconciled to his brother, the duke of Alençon, he intended, if he had lived, to have taken him off, and to have sent the queen-mother to her favourite son in Poland. Charles was so moderate in drinking, that, after having been once intoxicated, he is said never to have tasted wine again; and, tho' he had several mistresses, by one of whom he had the duke of Angoulesme, grand prior of France, yet he was decent in his amours; though it is said that the dose by which he died was administered by a gentleman whom the queen-mother persuaded that Charles intended to dispatch, in order to enjoy his wife; but in a scandalous court there are many fictions, nor can the bounds of general history admit of all the particulars that are incontestibly well supported. Charles, in his person, stooped a little in the shoulders; but he was otherwise strong and well made. Though he had naturally a livid complexion, yet it was turned to red on the night of the St. Bartholomew massacre; and it was observed, that, on that occasion, his eyes assumed a peculiar fierceness.

He had, towards the end of his life, entertained an affection for his wife, Elizabeth of Austria, one of the most virtuous and amiable princesses of her age; and by whom he had one daughter, Mary Elizabeth, who died when she was but six years of age. We cannot conclude the character of Charles, without observing, that he ordered a medal to be struck, commemorating his virtue and piety in the execrable murder of St. Bartholomew.

Henry III.

THE king of Navarre and the duke of Alençon continued to be close prisoners, under the custody of the queen-regent, at the time of the late king's death. She obliged them to sign whatever papers she laid before them, as if she and they were acting in the utmost harmony. Thereby she retained all her influence in the provinces, and the parliament addressed her to take the regency into her hands. This situation of affairs was her security. The magistrates and great officers, both civil and military, were kept in ignorance as to the real sentiments of the two imprisoned princes; and they were equally ignorant of the new king's sentiments, who remained still in Poland. The people of Paris were such enthusiasts for the Roman catholic religion, that the queen mother removed to the louvre, and committed the two marshals in the bastille to the custody of the burghers. She affected moderation towards the protestants, and took a body of Swiss and Germans into pay. She treated with the Rochellers, and permitted the hugonots to hold an assembly at Milhaud, in Rouvergne. They declared the prince of Conde their protector and captain-general; but assigned him a council; and they received into their association the marshal d'Anville, brother to Montmorenci, and governor of Languedoc, who considered himself as being proscribed at court.

The queen-mother was secretly enraged at those fruits of her indulgence to the hugonots. She ordered the count of Montgomery, who had surrendered himself prisoner upon promise of pardon, to be first tortured and then beheaded; and, having received from her son, the king of France and Poland, a confirmation of her authority, she set out for Lyon; but carried along with her the king of Navarre and the duke of Alençon.

In the mean while, Henry, with great address, after receiving the account of his brother's death, fled out of Poland, as from a prison, and was nobly entertained by the emperor Maximilian at Vienna; where that prince is said to have inspired him with favourable sentiments towards his protestant subjects. Henry then repaired to Venice, under an imperial escort; and there he spent nine days, as he used to say, under the enchantments of pleasure and magnificence. From thence he went to Savoy, where he was received with equal honours; but he consented to give up to that court Pignerole, and some other of his Piedmontese possessions. Wherever he came, he was advised to lenity towards his protestant subjects, and, while he was at Turin, he was persuaded, by the duke of Savoy, to send for d'Anville, whom he seemed greatly to care for. The emissaries of the queen mother about his person, entirely changed his sentiments, if ever he had any, that were favourable to the protestants. He formed a scheme for arresting d'Amville; but the duke of Savoy, who had engaged for his safety, discovered it, and sent him back with a guard to Languedoc: where he swore he never would see the king's face again but upon his coin.

When Henry drew near his own dominions, he found that he must pass through the midst of countries possessed by the hugonots before he could reach Lyons. The professors of that religion were exasperated to the last degree by the late measures of the regent; and, though he retained about his person the duke of Savoy's troops till he was joined by the queen-mother and the duke of Alençon, yet the hugonots found means to plunder and carry off part of his baggage; and it was the sixth of September before he reached Lyons. Having now got some troops about him, instead of following the excellent advice he had received, he fell, with sword in hand, upon his protestant subjects, and attempted to storm the places which he might have received upon the most moderate terms. When he attacked the small town of Lerrou, the inhabitants called from their walls, "Come on, ye bloody murderers, ye shall not find us asleep, as ye did the admiral."

culous,

tible conduct.

These dawnings of Henry's reign taught the protestants what they were to expect; and d'Amville, assembling the states of Languedoc, acquainted them, that he had associated himself with a confederacy, which he was to direct, for the re-establishment of the laws and tranquillity of France, and for freeing her from the pernicious influence of foreigners. The life of Henry, at this time, was a medley of devotion, the most infamous vices, and the most ridiculous weaknesses. The safety of the public consisted in his being destitute of his brother's great abilities for mischief; for he resembled him only in his dissimulation and cruelty. When he left Lyons, he came to Avignon; where he and his attendants practised all the penitential duties with such severity, that the cardinal of Lorraine is said to have lost his life by walking in one of his bare-footed processions at midnight. The Roman catholic party lost, in him, the wisest of its heads; and he left no subject in France behind him of equal abilities or authority, to have either enlarged or healed the wounds of his country. Some have thought that he was taken off by poison, administered by order of the queen-mother, who spoke of him always in extremes; sometimes as the scourge, sometimes as the guardian-angel of France. This frantic fit of devotion being over, Henry returned to his debaucheries; and the queen-mother employed the same kind of ladies about his person, as she had about those of the king of Navarre and the prince of Conde; so that she remained still mistress of the government, though the king, at times, affected to be extremely regular in the dispatch of business.

ness. He ratified the treaty of Blois with the queen of England; and, in a cold, but civil, manner, he restored the king of Navarre and the duke of Alençon to their liberty. He still loved the princess of Conde; but he heard of her death while he was consulting his mother about the means of obtaining her either by a divorce or otherwise.

It was happy for the hugonots that Henry had no money Henry's to keep his army on foot; and, as he was setting out for his narrow coronation at Rheims, one Forvagues, who had been a favourite in the late reign, threw himself at his feet in a peasant's habit, and discovered that two hundred resolute well-armed men were waiting at a certain place to carry him off. This discovery was confirmed by the duke of Alençon, who, on his knees, confessed all, upon promise of pardon; and, by the king's not setting out, the conspirators, knowing that they were discovered, left the kingdom in a body. When his coronation was over, he married the princess Louisa of Lorraine, daughter to the count of Vaudemont, and continued the war against the protestants. Montbrun, who had plundered his baggage on the frontiers, was beheaded by the sentence of the parliament of Grenoble; but his room was supplied by Lesdiguières, who afterwards made so great a figure in France. The hugonots were then joined by the moderate Roman catholics, and were so powerful, that Henry consented to treat with them. Their demands consisted of ninety-two articles, and comprehended an assembly of the states, an abolition of the new taxes, and the punishment of such a variety of crimes (magic among the rest) as, in fact, included the whole court; and the king drove the deputies from his presence with marks of indignation.

The war was then rekindled, and it soon appeared that flagitious the protestants were supported by queen Elizabeth, who conducted of supplied them with money for hiring a fresh body of Ger- the court. mans under prince Casimir. The queen-mother saw the danger of the government, and attempted the most desperate and flagitious means for breaking the confederacy. She procured poison to be administered to d'Amville, who recovered after it had been reported that he was dead. She persuaded her son to give Sauvrai, the only man about court who had sentiments of virtue, an order for dispatching the marshals Montmorenci and Cossé in prison; but Sauvrai accepted of it only that he might save them; which he did, for he persuaded the king to make them his friends by setting them at liberty.

The court was, about this time, alarmed by an imposthume appearing in the king's ear. He was so thoroughly persuaded that this was the effect of poison, administered to him by the duke of Alençon, that he called for the king of Navarre, and exhorted him to make sure of the crown, by putting the ruffian, meaning his brother, to death. The king of Navarre expressed his detestation of the crime, but said he would not purchase a kingdom at the price of so much guilt; and the French king's constitution got the better of the ailment.

A fix months truce concluded.

By this time the German auxiliaries were in march to join the protestants; and the duke of Alençon was so well apprized of his brother's suspicions, that he withdrew to Dreux, where he was soon joined by a numerous party. The valour of the duke of Guise, who beat the German auxiliaries in a battle, where he obtained the name of Balafré, prevented their joining the duke of Alençon; and the marshal, Montmorenci, joining the queen mother in a negotiation, a truce was concluded for six months, but upon the most mortifying terms for the French court. The king was obliged to pay the German auxiliaries, or rather Swiss, who had entered France under the prince of Conde. The duke of Alençon was to have guards; and the protestants were to be put in possession of Niort, Saumur, la Charité, Mezieres, St. John d'Angeli, and Coignac. It appears, from the management through which this peace was concluded, that the queen-mother and the duke of Alençon were equally obnoxious to the papists as the protestants; but the prince of Conde refused to agree to it.

It is followed by a pacification in favour of the protestants.

The truce being concluded, on the twenty-third of December, 1575, gave both parties time for concerting the operations of the succeeding campaign. The king of Navarre having escaped from court to his government of Guienne, retracted his abjuration of the protestant religion; and the duke of Alençon, after putting himself at the head of the prince of Conde's German auxiliaries, found that he commanded thirty-five thousand men; while all the army that the court could bring to the field, under the duke of Maine, who commanded during the indisposition of his brother, the duke of Guise, amounted to scarcely eighteen thousand. The queen-mother, assisted by the marshal Montmorenci, and, very possibly, by some heads of the protestants, who hated the duke of Alençon, now created duke of Anjou, broke the storm by fresh negotiations. At last, a pacification, consisting of sixty-three articles, was agreed upon; and the protestants gained thereby all they had so long contended for; which consisted in their being considered as a distinct people from the catholics, professing their own religion, and subjected to their own magistrates. The only restriction laid upon them, in the exercise of their worship, was, that they should not preach within two leagues of Paris, or the place where the court was held; the judiciary chambers in the parliament were to be composed of an equal number of protestants and catholics; the king solemnly purged himself of the admiral's death, and the massacre of St. Bartholomew; reversed all judgments consequent consequent thereto ; and exempted from taxes, for six years, the descendants of those who fell in the massacre. The protestants had an additional security of eight cautionary towns ; and the king engaged to pay prince Casimir, who had again invaded France at the invitation of the protestants, his arrears.

However flattering this peace might be to the protestants, the principles on which it rested were inconsistent with civil government, and the observance of it was impracticable. The king of Navarre and the prince of Conde knew this, and that it had been brought about by the queen-mother gaining over the duke of Alençon and the Montmorenci party, which she was resolved to do at any rate. The duke of Alençon had been flattered with a promise of the sovereignty of the Low Countries, which the queen-mother never meant to perform ; and, though his name was useful to the protestants, they detested him.

It is certain that the hugonot party never wore so pro- The holy would soon become the established, religion, through the weakness of the court, who opposed it. The late cardinal of Lorraine, uncle to the duke of Guise, had been of that opinion long before he died ; and had formed a scheme of an association, or, as it was called, a league, for the support of the catholic religion, independent both of the court and the protestants. The pacification, which was so much in favour of the reformed, gave the duke a plausible handle for carrying this league into execution, and he gave it the name of holy. One of its articles was, that the leaguers would defend one another, in the way either of justice or of arms, against all, without exception of persons. In short, the whole strain of the association tended to render the head of the league, who was not named, and his followers, independent of the civil power. The king and queen mother saw the blow that was aimed at the royal authority by this league ;

but it could not be averted otherwise than by breaking the late pacification with the protestants. In a few weeks it was signed by all the staunch Roman catholics in the kingdom ; and it was soon known that the pope and the king of Spain had promised to support it. Henry was unable to maintain his own authority ; and, by the advice of his council, he declared himself its head.

The French monarchy had never, since the time of Henry Division
V. of England, been in so low a situation as it then was. among power. Henry, by declaring himself head of the holy league, had not diminished the credit of the duke of Guise with the Roman catholics ; and the possessions of the crown were, in a manner, partitioned out among the princes of the blood and the great men. Casimir, and his German army, were permitted to live at free quarters till Chateau Thierry could be erected into a principality for him, and till he should receive seven hundred thousand crowns in ready money, besides an annuity of twelve thousand. The prince of Conde was in possession of Picardy, the king of Navarre of the greatest part of Guienne, and the marshal d'Amville of all Languedoc.

The states met at Blois, in November, 1576, and cancelled the edict of pacification; but neither the prince of Conde, the king of Navarre, nor d'Amville, though invited, were present in the assembly. Early next year, the states declared against any toleration of the protestants. The king, by his own authority, circulated the holy league round the provinces to be signed; but the states refused to grant him any money, the nation, as they alledged, being already exhausted. The misunderstanding that happened among the protestants, saved the court. D'Amville sought only to strengthen himself in Languedoc; and was so far from being thought well affected to protestantism, that he was suspected of keeping a private correspondence with the queen-mother. In fact, the hugonots, at last, looked upon him as their enemy; and seized Montpelier, which lay within his government. The people of Rochelle would not unite with the prince of Conde; and the king of Navarre remained on the defensive. The catholics were much better united; and, though the states would grant the king no money, yet he found means to raise an army, commanded by the duke of Anjou, and, under him, by the duke of Guise; and la Charite, and several other places, were taken from the protestants.

A new
peace concluded.

While the war had thus a favourable aspect for the Roman catholics, the king stopped its progress. He hated his brother; he was jealous of the duke of Guise; and, by the mediation of the duke of Montpensier, first a peace, and then a treaty, was concluded; by which the edict of pacification was re-established, but not in its full extent. This peace had no other effect than to give Henry a fresh opportunity of again plunging himself and his court into the most criminal pleasures. The king's infamous minions, as they were called, were at perpetual variance with the ministers of state, the princes of the blood, and the commanders of the army. No day passed without some atrocious murder being committed. The duke of Guise had assassins at his command, whom the king durst not punish for the crimes they committed; and the duke of Anjou again left the court, where he did not think himself sufficiently considered. The queen-mother dreaded a rupture among the catholics; and, on pretence of making up the differences that had happened between her daughter, the queen of Navarre, and her husband, band, she carried that princess, and some of her syrens, to the king of Navarre's court, and thereby found means to keep him quiet.

The remaining part of the year, 1577, passed in a state neither of war nor tranquillity. Henry, for fear of breaking with the king of Spain and the duke of Savoy, confirmed Bellegrade in possession of the marquisate of Saluces. The queen-mother obtained a cardinal's hat for Birague; and, at her recommendation, the seals were given to Chiverny. The parliament refused to register the money edicts sent them by the king; but he forced them, at last, into a compliance with his will.

The affairs of the Low Countries were, at this time, in the Affairs of utmost disorder; and intrigues were formed by the queen of the Low Navarre, who was a woman of genius and address, for put- Countries ting the duke of Anjou at the head of the revolt there. Having secured Cambray and Mons in his interest, he raised troops and offered himself, to the council of state, as successor to the archduke, whose authority was now become despicable in the Low Countries. Henry, knowing his brother to be now detached from all his concerns with the protestants, winked at the levies he made; but he durst not openly back him, for fear of disobliging queen Elizabeth, who, of all things, dreaded to see the Low Countries under a French dominion. To prevent that, she privately supplied the prince of Orange both with men and money; and engaged prince Casimir, if there should be occasion, to march to his assistance with his army. The protestants of Amsterdam, Harlem, and Utrecht, opposed the duke of Anjou; but his party had a majority in the council of state, and he was espoused by all the inhabitants of Artois and Hainault; and queen Elizabeth, to divert him from his purpose, gave his agent in England, Simier, such encouragement, that she drew the duke over to London, not to court, but, as he thought, to marry her; and he carried with him a set of articles, in favour of himself and his countrymen, especially the Roman catholics, which he required Elizabeth to sign. It belongs to the history of England to relate his disappointment, and the manner by which that artful princess evaded the match.

In the beginning of the year, 1678, the king instituted The order of the Holy Ghost, the mastership of which he of the Holy Ghost annexed to his own crown. It was to consist of an hundred instituted, persons, who were to hold no place, pension, or employment, under any foreign prince. This was the most politic act of Henry's reign, because it tended to weaken the league, and to break the dependence of the great French nobility upon the crown of Spain.

About the end of February, the queen of Navarre procured for the protestants three additional places of security in Guienne, and eleven in Languedoc; the former to be held till August, and the latter till October; and the treaty was concluded concluded at Nerac, by the king of Navarre on the part of the protestants. The conferences of Nerac being over, the queen mother had an interview with the marshal Bellegrade, who died soon after, as was suspected of poison; and the famous Nogarette de la Valette, afterwards duke of Epernon, was appointed to assist his infant son, who succeeded him in his government. By this time, the Montmorenci title and estate had devolved upon D'Amville, and the king of Navarre suspecting that the queen mother had gained him over, entered into closer engagements than ever with Lefdiguere, who, was then considered as one of the ablest generals in France, and who, after surprizing la Ferre in Picardy, went to negotiate a fresh supply of troops in Germany.

Till the treaty of Nerac was concluded, the king of Navarre had concealed the great talents he afterwards discovered; and the hugonots considered him but as a titular head of their party. Montmorenci required him to deliver up the cautionary towns; but instead of that he surprized Cahors, a place of the utmost importance, and defended with a numerous garrison under Verins, a brave, and able commander. The king acted with so much judgment and personal courage in that affair, that his character was all at once established, both as a general and a politician, especially as it was known that he had planned and conducted the whole by himself, and had undertaken it against the opinion of his best officers. He had recommended marshal Biron to be Henry's lieutenant in Guienne; but Biron, though he lived in the utmost intimacy with the king of Navarre, refused to obey any but his master's orders. La Ferre was retaken by the marshal Matignon, who commanded the royal army, and the duke of Anjou acted as the mediator between his brother and the king of Navarre, for the re-establishment of peace. Henry, on that occasion affected to act with vast moderation. The articles of Nerac were confirmed; the cautionary towns were afresh ceded to the protestants for six years, and the treaty was concluded at Flex in Perigord.

The pacification of Flex.

The violence of the prince of Conde, who was all this while negotiating in Germany for a fresh supply of mercenaries, had almost destroyed this salutary measure. He had promised them immense sums, and to put them in possession of cautionary towns till they were paid. The king of Navarre, and the other heads of the protestants, disliked the introduction of foreign troops into the strong places of France; and the pacification of Flex was ratified by them, the French king, and the parliament of Paris. The prince of Conde, Lefdiguere, and the rest of that party, still opposed the peace; but the death of don John of Austria, the prosperous situation of the duke of Anjou's affairs in the

Low

Low Countries, and, above all, the near prospect of his marriage with queen Elizabeth, obliged the prince of Conde and his friends to accede to the pacification of Flex. The accession of the crown of Portugal to the king of Spain, Elizabeth's determined enemy; strengthened him so much, that Elizabeth resolved, if possible, to make the French king her friend; but it is uncertain to this day, whether she ever had any serious thoughts of marrying the duke of Anjou. The encouragement she gave him was, however, so great, and the assistances he received from her were so considerable, that he was at the head of an army of twenty thousand well appointed troops, and he forced the prince of Parma to raise the siege of Cambrai, which he had formed. He had reduced all the Cambresis; when Pomponne de Bellevue, in the name of his master, the French king, disowned all the duke's hostilities against the Spaniards, and offered his mediation for a cessation of arms; but it was rejected by the prince of Parma. It was thought, that Henry acted in this manner to prevent any close connections between the kings of Spain and Navarre, the latter of whom affirmed to Henry, that the other had offered him troops for the conquest of Guienne.

This coldness of Henry towards the sovereignty which his brother had actually, by this time, obtained in the Low Countries, had almost proved fatal to the Belgic confederacy then formed by the prince of Orange. Tho' Elizabeth was the secrets of that prince, who never intended that the duke should have any other than a nominal power in the Low Countries, yet she was still backward in provoking Spain, because she was uncertain of being supported by Henry. She had actually promised to marry the duke of Anjou, if the French court would have entered into a secret treaty with her, offensive and defensive, the particulars of which have not come to our hands; but neither Henry nor his mother would agree to it, and Elizabeth suffered prince Casimir's troops, who consisted of seven thousand horse, and eight thousand foot, to enlist themselves under the prince of Parma, or to return home, for want of pay. The artful queen mother seems all along to have distrusted Elizabeth's intention to marry her son; for though a most splendid embassy, with the prince dauphin of Auvergne at its head, was sent over to England, and most affectionately received by Elizabeth, yet she insisted upon the secret treaty being concluded before she gave her hand to the duke. Henry and his mother, on the other hand, who never intended to yield to any terms that could be of prejudice to the Roman catholic religion, required that the marriage should be consummated before the treaty was concluded. The duke of Anjou was pressed for money; his army was mouldering away; the prince of Orange, who really made him his tool, was neither able nor willing to serve him, and the prince of Parma was daily gaining ground.

The duke

Elizabeth.

The duke of Anjou had now only his marriage with Elizabeth to trust to; and the encouragement his agents had received determined him to put his little army into cantonments, after which he went over to England in November 1581, after obtaining a present of a hundred thousand crowns from Elizabeth. His courtship was so successful, that Elizabeth certainly drew a ring from her own finger and put it upon his, and the French historians have pretended to produce the marriage articles, signed by herself and her ministers. In short, all Europe thought that the match was concluded. The catholics of France, and the protestants of England, equally disliked it; and Elizabeth, next morning, when the duke came to receive her hand, told him she had considered better of the affair, and that she could not at that time think of marrying. This alteration of her mind was partly owing to her own unwillingness to share her power with a husband, and partly to the representations of her two ministers, Hatton, and Walsingham, who had always disliked the match.

His am-
views.

Though the duke of Anjou's patience was, on this occasion, put to a severe trial, yet Elizabeth softened her refusal with most exquisite artifice. She managed so as to keep the duke in her interest, and when he returned to the Low Countries, he carried with him a large sum of money, besides other valuable presents, and a body of English volunteers, among whom were some of Elizabeth's chief nobility. All those appearances, with Elizabeth's own declarations, that she only delayed the match, gave him vast credit with the princes on the continent. He was in the month of March 1582, conducted to Antwerp, where the deputies of the provinces, with the prince of Orange at their head, recognized and installed him duke of Brabant, and he afterwards was acknowledged as duke of Flanders, at Ghent. An attempt made by a Biscayan, one Gaspar Anastro, upon the prince of Orange's life, was by the common people imputed to the duke of Anjou, and all the French in his retinue were disarmed. This made him sensible that his high sounding titles gave him no real power; and he demanded that the states should declare the king his brother his successor to his two dutchies in case of his death. The queen mother had at this time, a view upon the crown of Portugal, and Henry had quarrelled with the king of Spain upon that account. The duke therefore received some encouragement in his affairs from Henry and his mother, and they promised to support him, if by some bold and seasonable stroke he could render himself independent of the states, and sovereign of the countries which he held only in name. This hurried him into the mad ill-concerted attempt of seizing Antwerp; but in the mean time, the prince prince of Orange is said to have discovered and disappointed a plot of the Spaniards for assassinating himself, the French king, and the duke. Such conspiracies are frequently mentioned, and the conspirators are said to have confessed their crimes; but we are to remark, that they were under tortures.

Whatever may be in those reports, it is certain that there He loses was now a thorough breach between the courts of France the sovereign and Spain, and that Henry was disposed to have effectually reigned of assisted his brother, if the latter could have made himself the Ne-master of Antwerp, and other capital places in the Lowtherlands. Countries. But Henry could assist him with no money. He had lavished immense sums upon his favourites, the dukes of Foyeuse, and Epernon, the former of whom he married to his own queen's sister, and the wedding entertainments cost him four millions of livres. Not satisfied with this, he created them dukes and peers of France, and gave them precedence over all the eldest noblemen of the same rank; and all this, when France was afflicted by pestilence and famine. Every resource of state for raising money was now exhausted; and the prodigality of the marquis D'O, comptroller of the finances, had squandered one million, three hundred thousand francs, which Henry had with great difficulty procured from the clergy. The hopes of plunder had converted the French soldiery into so many adventurers, and Strozzi's fleet, which was to have put the queen mother in possession of the Azore islands, was beaten by the Spaniards, while the French on board the ships that were taken, were treated as pirates, for presuming to assist rebels. The duke of Anjou's army was composed of men, who expected to be paid by the plunder of the provinces, which he pretended to govern. The daily proofs he discovered of his levity, ambition, and dissatisfaction with the prince of Orange, and the states, had prevailed with Elizabeth to withhold her hand from supporting him; and he was now under a necessity of precipitating the measures he had planned. He seized Dunkirk, St. Vinox, Dixmuyde, and Vilvorde, because the states refused to receive his garrisons into those places; but he undertook to surprize Antwerp in person. In this he was disappointed by the valour of the prince of Orange, who killed fifteen hundred of his men, and forced him to fly to Dunkirk. He there entered into a secret correspondence with the Spaniards, which the prince of Orange discovered, and he had credit enough with Henry to procure, upon cheap terms, from the duke, the places which he intended to have sold to the Spaniards. After this, the duke of Anjou became despicable to all parties. His army, which was commanded by Biron, was beaten by the prince of Parma, who retook Dunkirk, Furnes, Newport, St. Vinox, Dixmuyde, and Menin. The duke of Anjou, upon that, retired to France.

Henry

*Henry's
plan of
ment.*

Henry had, at this time, adopted new plans both of living and reigning. While he was immersed in the most infamous sensualities with his minions in the night time, he appeared sometimes by day at their head, clad in white sackcloth, with a whip and a string of beads hanging at his girdle, clothed as penitents, and he going by the name of friar Henry. Those and many other extravagant acts of devotion, rendered him despicable in the eyes of the public, and strengthened the league under the duke of Guise. Henry, if he had a meaning in what he did, intended to have formed in his kingdom a third party, who being attached to his person only should render him independent both of the protestants and the league. He is said to have been so much engrossed by his minions, that he consulted the pope about dividing his dominions between the dukes of Foyeuse, and Epernon. This intention was suspected by the queen of Navarre, and Henry accused her of intercepting one of his couriers, for which she was ignominiously arrested, and sent under a guard to her husband. The queen mother's influence over Henry was first diminished, and then destroyed, by his favourites, and she endeavoured to embroil the government which she could no longer direct. The Guises applied themselves to the duke of Anjou, whose spirit as well as fortune was now broken by intemperance and vexation; and they offered to make him their head. Either, levity or remorse of conscience, prompted the duke to discover this to his brother; and they seemed, for some time, to live together in the utmost harmony. The duke's health, however, was daily decaying, and he died on the tenth of June 1585, at Chateau Thierri.

Confulta- The holy league was still gaining ground. Its heads

The queen mother, after her son had disgraced her, joined them, and she proposed to divert the succession to her grandson, the prince of Lorraine; nor were there wanting many leaguers, who privately whispered, that his right was preferable to that of the house of Valois, as being descended; not from the Capetine, but the Carlovingian line, by Charles of Lorraine. A grand meeting of the party was held at Bassompierre's house, near Nancy. It was therefore resolved not to provoke either the protestants or the Germans; but to draw up a state of the grievances which the nation suffered from the power of the minions. The death of the duke of Anjou disconcerted them, and the duke of Lorraine proposed that his son, the prince, should be declared their head; but the duke of Guise, who wanted to have the management of the whole, prevailed with the assembly, (as the king of Navarre, next heir to the crown by the salic law, was a heretic,) that the old cardinal of Bourbon, a weak man, and a violent papist, papist, and next to that prince in the succession, should be declared their head.

It is pretended, that Henry, even at this time, by a steady Firmness conduct, had it in his power to have dashed the league in of the pieces; but we can scarcely assent to that opinion, when king of we consider the complexion of the three parties which then Navarre. divided the kingdom. Henry very sensibly sought to make the king of Navarre his friend, and sent the duke of Epernon to him to convince him of his danger, and that he had no safety but by declaring himself a Roman catholic. The king of Navarre behaved with great decency on the occasion; but refused to change his religion, though he effected a reconciliation between Henry and the marshal Montmorenci. Henry seeing his danger, acted with more wisdom and spirit than he was thought to be possessed of. He now appeared often in public, and by his edicts he pronounced all associations and leagues to be high treason, annulling, at the same time, fifty-six money edicts, and giving up seven hundred thousand livres of his own revenue.

The protestant affairs in the Low Countries, were at this time, so low, the prince of Orange having been assassinated, that the French writers inform us, the states sent a deputation, to offer the sovereignty of their country to Henry, but that he refused it. Whatever may be in this, it is certain, that he admitted the deputies into his presence, by which the Spanish part of the league were so much alarmed, that they called upon the duke of Guise to take the field immediately. He was the rather inclined to this, as he knew the duke of Epernon, after he returned from his interview with the king of Navarre, intended to have seized him. The cardinal of Bourbon was carried by the leaguers to Peronne, as being a place of safety, and a new treaty was concluded at Joinville; by which they engaged, upon the demise of Henry III. to raise the cardinal of Bourbon to the throne; to introduce the decrees of the council of Trent into France; and to restore Cambray to his Catholic majesty, upon his paying them fifty thousand crowns a month while they continued in arms. Could they have prevailed with pope Gregory to have entered heartily into their confederacy, Henry might have been dethroned; but his holiness, refused to agree either to that or to any attempt upon his person. Notwithstanding this, the duke, in the beginning of the year 1585, was prevailed on to take the field at the head of no more than five thousand men, while his party published a manifesto in the cardinal of Bourbon's name, tending to render Henry the object of his people's contempt, ridicule, and hatred.

The king of Navarre wrote, on this occasion, a most re- Weakness vices, and at the same time challenged the duke of Guise to fight him, either singly, or attended with what number of friends

friends he should chuse to name. It soon appeared that the resolution and spirit of Henry were counterfeits. His mother undertook to mediate between him and the league, and he was secretly inclined to give up every thing, though even his appearance in the field would have obliged the duke of Guise to leave the kingdom. Instead of that, he took Verdun, and was prevented only by the vigilance of the duke of Epernon from seizing Metz, while the marshal Matignon secured Bourdeaux for the king. The city and citadel of Lyons, however, fell under the power of the leaguers; but they were driven out of Marseilles, which they had become masters of by a conspiracy, the heads of which were capitally punished.

His accommodation with the league.

Henry, at last, agreed to accept of his mother's mediation with the leaguers; and he published a manifesto, promising pardon to such of his subjects as should lay down their arms. The city of Rheims was pitched upon as the place of interview, between the queen mother and the leaguers; who came prepared with a schedule of their demands. These consisted in the king obliging the protestants to resign all the cautionary towns they held, and to withdraw their protection from the protestants of Geneva. He was likewise to put the chief strong places of his kingdom into the hands of the leaguers; to advance them money for paying their troops; and to cancel all the edicts that had been published in favour of the protestants. Such were the infamous terms upon which Henry purchased a peace from his rebel subjects, and it was solemnly proclaimed, in the month of July, by an edict dated at Nemours.

The king of Navarre's consternation.

The king of Navarre was struck with such consternation upon reading this edict, that the hair of one of his lips, is said, all of a sudden, to have turned grey. The king, at the request of the leaguers, invited him once more to renounce his heresy; but he kept his sword in his hand, and prepared to defend himself to extremity. Henry found himself now in a worse situation than ever. The leaguers were masters of his crown, and one of them, a private citizen of Paris, called Rocheblen, cantoned out his capital into sixteen parts, each of which was to be under the direction of a zealous leaguer. This partition gave rise to the famous council of sixteen. Henry had no sooner rendered himself the slave of the leaguers, than they raised money in great abundance in his name, though in fact it was to be employed against his person and authority.

Marshal Montmorenci continued to profess the catholic religion; but he was a declared enemy to persecution and to all connections with foreign powers on account of religion; and professed himself a friend to the constitution of his country. Sixtus V. was then pope, and though he carried his pontifical authority to the utmost stretch, yet his aversion aversion to the crown of Spain did not suffer him to patronize the league. Considering himself as being the great The house disposer of kingdoms, he neglected the title of the cardinal of Bourbon; but he excommunicated the king of Navarre, bon ex- and the prince of Conde, whom he termed the bastard, and communi- detestable race of the house of Bourbon; and declared them cated. to have forfeited all right of succession to the crown. The same pope, by another bull, excommunicated all who should take arms against the king. The king of Navarre resented his excommunication in a most signal manner; for he posted up papers even in Rome itself, formally giving the pope the lye; and he made an appeal from the bull to the peers of France. Henry might have saved himself and his authority, if by one spirited step, he had thrown himself upon the king of Navarre's party, and that of the moderate Roman catholics under Montmorenci. But he was now in the hands of the leaguers, and on the fifteenth of October, he published a most rigorous edict, enjoining his subjects to resume the Roman catholic religion in fourteen days, on pain of forfeiting all their effects.

The leaguers by their violence, and submitting to the Violence pope's bull, hurt their own cause; for all the Roman catho- of the lics, who had any regard for the constitution of their leaguers. country, abhorred their proceedings. The king of Navarre was the life of the protestant cause; the prince of Conde, and Lesdiguere, were his seconds, but the chief weight of the power of the league was directed against the king. It is amazing, that the body of the people of France should be so infatuated as they were at this time. The duke of Epernon was the only great man who declared himself an enemy to all, whether leaguers, or protestants, who were enemies to his master's authority; and he acted against both at the head of an army in Provence, and Dauphiny. The duke of Maine, who was considered as the most zealous leaguer in France, commanded in Guienne, against the king of Navarre, who was not able to face him in the field, and was obliged to act upon the defensive. The marshal Matignon commanded in the neighbourhood of Bordeaux; but his principles, and conduct, were so moderate, that he quarrelled with the duke of Maine, who represented him as being a traitor to the league, and repaired to court, complaining, that his counsels were betrayed, himself unsupported, and his troops disbanding for want of pay. The duke of Guise was the only general of the league who joined great execution to great abilities; for he did more service to his cause, at the head of a small army, in Champagne, and Burgundy, than all his brother generals did.

The king of Navarre was, at this time, in a dangerous Danger of situation, as he had not only the king, and the league to the king oppose, but his own queen, who, after he was excommu- of Na- nicated by the pope, behaved as his most bitter enemy. varre. He

He had acted with great address during the campaign ; but through the irresistible passion he had for women, he had more than once exposed himself to the danger of falling into the duke of Maine's hands. The prince of Conde had been supported with some money from England, which enabled him to act with vigour on the side of Xaintoigne; and he gained over to the protestant interest the powerful duke of la Trimouille, whose sister he had married. The Rochellers continued to consider themselves as being a separate commonwealth of protestants, and both the king of Navarre, and prince of Conde endeavoured to induce them to act with greater vigour in assisting them to destroy the port of Brouage, which they thought hurt their commerce. Marshal Biron was sent with an army to oppose them, and he effectually checked their progress on that side ; but without being of any other service to the cause of the league.

Diffimulation of Henry.

Henry every day was more and more sensible, though he durst not discover his sentiments, that the success of the league would be more fatal to him than that of the protestants. He had, in the month of June, held a court, or as it was called, a bed of justice, where he ordered the parliament to register several money edicts, not for his own use, as he declared, but that of the league. He told all, in whom he could have any confidence, that he considered the leaguers as his greatest enemies ; and he gave secret orders to the generals he could trust, to keep that party from getting footing in the places they possessed. It has even been more than insinuated, that Henry, (though he sent over the marquis de Bellievre to intercede with Elizabeth for Mary queen of Scots,) was far from being displeased with her barbarous execution, because of her connection with the Guises. When the king of Navarre, however, procured from the protestant princes of Germany a deputation in favour of his hugonot subjects, Henry, out of fear of the league, durst not treat them with common civility, and drove them from his presence, because their masters had presumed to meddle in the internal affairs of his kingdom.

Power of the duke
of Montmorenci.

The marshal duke of Montmorenci, by the neutrality he observed, may be said to have held the ballance of parties in France at this time. The king of Spain could not entirely trust the Guises, because of their dependence on the pope ; and both he and the duke of Savoy paid him vast subsidies, and by speaking of the hugonots as heretics, he was in high favour with the court of Rome. The kings of France, and Navarre, considered him as their trustee, in case the former should be oppressed by the league, or the latter succeed to the crown, because, on all occasions, he treated the leaguers as enemies to their country. The duke of Guise, and his faction, saw Henry's secret dispositions, and did all they could to ruin him with the catholics, and the king once more employed his mother to obtain a peace from the protestants. She undertook it with the assistance of the duke of Nevers, and marshal Biron; but the king of Navarre, for that time, stood firm against all her Syrens, and as she had no power to offer a toleration of religion, she could only obtain a truce for a few months; yet such was the situation of Henry, that he told the marquis of Rosni, afterwards the famous duke of Sully, and first minister to the king of Navarre, that he would suffer his master to take twenty thousand Swiss into his pay, if he would promise to employ them against the leaguers.

The duke of Maine continued still in discontent at Paris, Queen and was the oracle of the council of sixteen, who omitted Elizabeth nothing that could blacken Henry's character with their supports party. The king had some spies among them, who informed him of a design they had to seize his person at Paris, and to send him prisoner to the duke of Guise. They were disappointed; but the king was forced to suffer the duke of Maine to leave Paris, without calling him to account. The affairs of the protestants in France, must have been again ruined, had not queen Elizabeth supplied the king of Navarre with money, and employed her credit so effectually in Germany, that the protestant princes there entered into a fresh league with the hugonots, and raised twenty thousand men for their assistance.

Henry was once more reduced to the necessity of throwing himself upon the league, or upon the protestants; and of Navarre so great a slave was he to the Roman catholic religion, that he resolved upon the former, though the duke of Guise, in a conference he had with him at Meaux, had treated him with indecency and invectives. The German army had not yet passed the Loire, and Henry's great business was to prevent their joining the king of Navarre. Henry on this occasion again threw off his indolent habits, and exerted himself with great abilities, both in the field, and the cabinet. He himself drew up the plan of operations. He gave the duke of Guise the command of an army, which was to watch the motions of the Germans, and to prevent their becoming masters of any place of importance, while he himself, with a third army, was to dispute the passage of the Loire. Besides those three armies, the duke of Joyeuse was placed at the head of a fourth, in order to fight the king of Navarre, in his march to join the protestants. That king and the duke met together on the twentieth of October at Coutras; and it was here that the king of Navarre gathered his first laurels in a pitched battle. Though inferior in strength to his enemies, he gave them battle; and fought at the head of his troops like a common soldier, while all his dispositions were those of a great general. He took several prisoners with his own hands, and after a most bloody dispute, victory declared in his favour. The duke of Joyeuse was shot through the head, though he offered a hundred thousand crowns for his ransom: four hundred noblemen and gentlemen who attended him as volunteers, were cut in pieces, as were five thousand of his common soldiers. In short, the victory was complete on the part of the king of Navarre, who shewed himself worthy of it, by his humanity towards the vanquished.

but loses
the fruit
of his victory.

It has been generally thought, that if after his victory at Coutras, the king of Navarre had advanced towards the Loire and joined his German auxiliaries, he might have reduced with ease the provinces of Xaintoigne, Angoumois, Poitou, and part of Anjou. But instead of attempting this, it is certain, that he carried the trophies of his victories to Bearn, where he laid them at the feet of the countess of Grammont. Others pretend to say, that the king had not money to keep his troops together, and that while he went to Bearn, the prince of Conde, who was not suspected of any intrigues with the fair sex, retired likewise to Poitou, from whence he went to St. John d'Angeli. Whatever might have been the motives of the conduct of those two princes, it certainly brought the protestant religion in France to the brink of ruin. The duke of Guise, a brave, and an active general, commanded against the Germans, whom he defeated, in two battles; and they being in no condition to subsist in an enemy's country, till the king of Navarre could again take the field, accepted of a sum of money, which carried them back to their own countries; and left the duke of Guise possessed of the title of deliverer of France. He made use of his popularity in executing a scheme for stripping Henry of all but the title of king. Though his successes had been in a great measure owing to the dispositions planned by Henry himself, yet he and his party accused him of having underhand invited the Germans into France, where their army was increased to thirty thousand men; and of his having all along kept a secret correspondence with the king of Navarre, and the heads of the hugonots. The doctors of the Sorbonne came to a resolution, that a prince may for malversation be deposed from his throne; and though they were reproved, yet they were not punished, by Henry.

Sudden
death of the prince of Conde.

While the prince of Conde remained at St. John de Angeli, he died suddenly, after having supped with his princess, whom the judge of the place committed to prison for having poisoned her husband. It appears, as if the king of Navarre himself had thought the prince did not die fairly; for his commissioners confirmed the sentence passed by the same judge for one of the prince's chief domestics being drawn asunder by four horses. The princess appealed to the court of peers, who declared her innocent; and six months after she was delivered of a son, who was afterwards known by the name of the Great Prince of Conde. In the mean while, in an assembly held at Nanci by the duke of Guise, and the heads of the league, a paper, consisting of eleven articles, was drawn up to be approved of, or rejected by Henry. In this paper, they demanded that he should receive the decrees of the council of Trent; establish the inquisition throughout his kingdom; pardon no heretic, who did not abjure his religion; and banish all, who were obnoxious to them, from his person, and admit others of their recommendation to succeed them. Henry, though a complete master of dissimulation, could not conceal his vexation, when those, and other articles equally derogatory to his authority, were presented to him by the duke of Guise. He promised, however, to consider of them, and the duke repaired to Soissons, while the king remained at Paris. The proceedings of the leaguers there were disloyal beyond expression; and if Henry had not been too much under the influence of his mother, and one Villequier, a favourite, he might at once have seized all the council of sixteen; but he only reproved some of their heads, and thereby put them more upon their guard. Henry was faithfully served by one Poulain, as a spy, and it was owing to his intelligence that he escaped an attempt made by the dutchess of Montpensier for surprizing him, as he was taking the air, and sending him prisoner to her brother the duke of Guise at Soissons. He wrote two letters ordering the duke not to enter Paris, but according to Voltaire, not having money to defray the expence of sending them by special messengers, they had not reached him, when, on the ninth of May, he presented himself in that capital before the queen mother, whom he required to introduce him to her son. This insolent demand being communicated to Henry, he lost his usual temper, and declared that he would comply with it, that he might have the pleasure of seeing the traitor stabbed before his face; but he was again dissuaded from this violent resolution by the queen mother, and Villequier. The duke was escorted to his audience by the Populacclamations of the citizens, who called him the saviour of rity of the his country, and the defender of the catholic faith. After duke of he had returned safe from his audience, the king published Guise. another edict, ordering all strangers to leave Paris, and to enforce obedience to it, he ordered four thousand Swiss, and two thousand French troops to enter the city, where they posted themselves; but without any orders to fire. A number of the citizens, and the scholars of the university took arms, which had been provided before by the heads of their party, and raising barricades in the streets, they attacked the king's troops so briskly that they either forced them to submit, or drove them entirely out of the city; upon upon which, Henry, who found himself now blockaded in the Louvre, came to a resolution of flying to Chartres.

The king escapes from him. While the king was contriving the means of escaping, several scenes of dissimulation passed between the queen-mother and the duke of Guise, on pretence of bringing about an accommodation; but in reality to gain time, which was equally necessary for both. The duke, at last, thinking he had obtained his ends, refused to treat any longer; but the queen-mother going on foot to his apartments to have another conference, the duke was giving her his final answer, when intelligence came that the king was escaped. The duke exclaimed against the queen-mother for having amused him to his destruction; and dispositions were now made on both sides for renewing the civil war with more fury than ever. All the foreign ministers at Paris, received from the duke, guards, and protections, excepting Stafford, the English resident, who though more obnoxious than them all, refused to accept of either.

They are again reconciled. Henry, in his journey from Paris to Chartres, travelled under the most apparent disquiet of mind, and was no sooner arrived there than he published a most bitter manifesto against the treasonable attempts of the Parisians; whom the duke of Guise had now by his authority reduced to order and tranquillity. He quickly found, however, that the Parisians were far from being unanimous, in his favour; that the parliament was disgusted with the proceedings of his party, and that he could not depend upon its leaders, who were most of them madmen, and enthusiasts. The queen-mother carried along with her to Chartres deputies, both from the city and parliament, to implore the king's pardon for what had passed, which they obtained, on condition of the inhabitants behaving better for the future. It is uncertain, whether Henry, at this time, had fixed the resolution of assassinating the duke of Guise; it is probable he had not, and that he was, at this time, entirely actuated by his mother, and his own bigotted notions of religion. The duke of Guise, on the other hand, disliked the appearance of submission that had been shewn to Henry by the parliament and city of Paris; and thus both sides were disposed to a treaty; but the king is said to have been strongly influenced by the Spanish armada (which was sent to invade England) appearing off the coast of Bretagne. He granted the leaguers almost the same terms that he had rejected with so much indignation when they were sent him from Nanci; and a new edict was published, enjoining all his subjects, under the beforementioned penalties, to conform themselves to the Roman catholic religion; but in the mean time, an assembly of the states was indicted to be held at Blois, in the September following. This was followed by a vast profusion of favours on the part part of Henry towards the leaguers. He declared the cardinal of Bourbon first prince of the blood; he gave the command of his armies to the duke of Guise, as lieutenant general, and he deprived the duke of Epernon of his government of Normandy, which he conferred on the duke of Montpensier. It was remarkable, however, that Henry in his return from Rouen (where he had concluded the pacification) to Chartres, refused, though strongly pressed to it, to enter Paris.

The late pacification made no other alterations of parties in France than by the king's authority being now thrown into the scale of the league. The dukes of Montmorenci, Epernon, and his brother the duke de la Valette, continued to make war or peace among themselves, as independent sovereigns. The queen mother, who hated the duke of Epernon, had procured the king's orders for the inhabitants to drive him out of Angoulesme, and in consequence of those orders he must have been murdered, had he not, with no more than thirty of his domestics, defended himself in the castle till he was relieved by the duke de la Valette. In short, a perfect disregard of the king's authority reigned throughout all the distant provinces; and Henry now passed his time chiefly in consulting with the duke of Guise upon the most effectual method of extirminating his protestant subjects. It is thought by many, that the queen mother, from the desire she had that the crown of France should descend to the family of Lorraine, was now sincerely reconciled to the duke of Guise. The duke of Savoy took advantage of those distractions, by driving the French from most of the places they held in his dominions, and reducing the important fort of Carmagnoles, where their magazines lay. The duke of Guise was all this time exulting in the public distractions. He was the idol of the league, and the common people, and by the good order to which he reduced Paris, he gave the public a specimen of his abilities for government.

Henry again returned to himself, and to that natural good sense of which he was master, when not under the delusions of favouritism, bigotry, and ignorance. Upon his arrival at Blois on the first of September, the chancellor Chiverny, was discharged from his post, which was given to Antholon, a violent leaguer; and the secretaries of state, with the comptroller of the finances, likewise lost their places, and were confined to their houses. The cardinals of Bourbon, and Guise, were chosen speakers by the clergy, who were represented by one hundred and thirty-four deputies. The count de Brisac, and the baron de Magnac, were speakers for the nobility, who were present to the number of one hundred and eighty; and la Chapelle Martreau, the provost of the merchants of Paris, was at the head of one hundred and ninety one deputies, who represented the third estate, estate, or what we may call the commons. The session was opened on the sixteenth of October by the king in a speech, that by the manner of its delivery, and the weight of its contents, discovered how much he had hitherto abused his talents. Though he professed himself strongly attached to the catholic religion, yet he touched upon the great lines of government with great dignity, and in a masterly manner reproached the duke of Guise, and the heads of the league, for having formed alliances with foreign powers on account of religion. They were seen to change colour at his words; but he and they afterwards received the sacrament at the same altar in token of their being reconciled. This was an impious act of dissimulation on both sides, as the duke was actually concerting measures for shutting Henry up in a convent, and altering the succession; and Henry by his spies was made acquainted with all the duke's and his family's practices, and was determined to punish them. Henry had, at this time, scarcely a friend about him. He secretly distrusted, and indeed, detested, his mother for her connections with the Guises; but he thought he could open his mind to the marshal d'Aumont, Nicholas d'Angemes, and his brother Lewis, the sieur de Rambouillet, and Beauvais Nangis. He laid before them a detail of all the projects the league meant to execute, many of which had been discovered to him by the princes of the house of Lorraine, who disliked their kinsman's ambition, and, after long consultation, it was resolved that the duke of Guise, and his brother, the cardinal, were now too big for public justice, and should be taken off by assassination. Henry called for Crillon, colonel of his guards, and esteemed one of the bravest men in France, and asked if he would undertake it. His answer was, that he was a soldier and not a hangman; but that, if his majesty pleased, he would send the duke a challenge, and endeavour to kill him fairly in single combat.

Nothing but the distress in which Henry then was, and the nearness of his danger, could have induced him to so detestable a measure, and one Loignac, the first gentleman of his body guards, undertook the assassination. These according to Mr. Voltaire, consisted of forty five poor and desperate Gascon gentlemen, whom the duke of Epernon had placed about the king's person, as foreseeing that he might want their services on such occasions. The duke of Guise, it is uncertain by whom, had notice of his danger; but he despised the intimation. Early on the twenty-third of December, in 1588, the duke of Guise was called by Revol, the secretary of state, into the king's closet; but in lifting up the hangings, he was stabbed by the Gascon ruffians, in six different places with daggers, which Henry had presented them with his own hands. The memoirs of those times mention, that those Gascons had a particular quarrel quarrel with the duke, who wanted to disband them, and that the king employed nine of them in the assassination ; that the duke was advised by the archbishop of Lyons, who was in daily expectation of a cardinal's hat, to leave the command of the army to the dukes of Maine, and Nevers, and to take upon himself the old office of mayor of the palace, which would entitle him to render the king a cypher, and to be always about his person. Many other particulars are related too minute for general history. It is certain, that the cardinal of Guise, and the archbishop of Lyons, who were in the next room, were put under arrest by the king's order ; and that he declared both to his council, and his mother, that he was now a monarch, because the duke was dead. It is uncertain whether the queen mother was in the secret of the king's design ; it is most probable that she was not, for all the preparations for striking the blow were made by the king himself, with the most impenetrable secrecy and address. The dukes of Elbeuf, and Nemours, the cardinal of Bourbon, the prince de Joinville, son to the duke of Guise, and his mother Anne, d'Este, were all put under arrest by the king's order, as were all the heads of the league, and his most intimate friends, who were then at Blois ; but the dukes of Merceur, and Maine, made their escape, and were soon after followed by the duke of Nemours. The cardinal of Guise had distinguished himself in a particular manner by his insolence towards Henry's person ; and he was next day murdered by Henry's halberdiers. The bodies of both the brothers were burnt, and their ashes scattered in the air, to prevent the veneration which it was foreseen the common people would pay to their relics.

Nothing could have given the leaguers any consolation for the death of the duke of Guise ; but that of the queen mother, which happened on the fifth of January 1589, in the seventieth year of her age. Her name is to this day held in detestation, as the mother of all the wickedness, impiety, superstition, luxury and debauchery of every kind, that had so long rendered the court of France infamous. When she saw her power irrecoverable, and her death unavoidable, she recommended to her son an alteration of his manners, and earnestly pressed him to cherish the king of Navarre.

Henry was miserably deceived in thinking that the death of the duke of Guise and his brother would put an end to the distractions of France ; for they now rose higher than ever, because they proceeded on the part of the league, from enthusiasm, which has often proved too strong for the sentiments of honour and loyalty. The duke of Maine fled to Paris, where the doctors of the Sorbonne openly declared the people to be absolved from their allegiance to the king ; and the clergy were ordered not to pray for him in public. His statues, pictures and arms were demolished, and his person was treated in terms too coarse for the page of history to relate. The greatest part of the parliament, however, continued firm in their duty; but fifty of their presidents and counsellors were arrested, and carried prisoners in their robes through the streets of Paris, by Bussy de Clerc, whom the duke of Guise had made governor of the bastile. The duke of Aumale, was made governor of the city; the duke of Maine, was put at the head of their army, with the title of lieutenant-general of the royal state and crown of France; and it was with some difficulty that he avoided being declared king. A new parliament was created. Brissson was forced to accept of the first presidency, and Moler of being attorney general; both of them under terror of their lives. The new members took an oath to be firm to the league, and to revenge the death of the duke of Guise, and his brother. A council of forty members acted under the duke of Maine, and issued edicts for raising money. The example of Paris was followed by Rouen, Lyons, Tholouse, almost all the provinces of Bretagne, Orleans, Marseilles, Bourges, Toulon, Aix, and Arles, together with the provinces of Maine, and Auvergne.

The league supported by the king of Spain.

It now appeared that the league had been long supported by the king of Spain, for his ambassadors repaired to Paris. It was in vain for the king, and the Roman catholic nobility about his person, to make the strongest declarations against the heretics, and the hugonots, the war against whom languished on all sides. Henry then saw himself abandoned by all, whom his indolence, bigotry, and timidity, or the influence of his mother had induced him to trust; but they were replaced by men of honour and abilities, who still had vast influence in the kingdom. By the agency of Diana de Angoulesme, Henry accepted of the king of Navarre's generous offer of serving him unconditionally with all his force, and a thorough reconciliation was effected between them at Tours. The other princes of the blood, the dukes of Montmorenci, Epernon, and Nevers, with the cardinal de Lenonceur, repaired to the royal standards, and Henry emitted an edict removing the parliament and chamber of accounts from Paris to Tours. Before he could get together his army he was almost surprized and carried off by a detachment of the horse of the league; but he escaped to Tours, where they were bravely repulsed by Crillon, the colonel of his guards. Fresh forces, however, pouring in, Henry must have surrendered himself had he not been relieved by the king of Navarre; and in a few days Henry saw himself at the head of an army of between thirty and forty thousand men.

Meanness of Henry.

It is not to be dissembled that he did not support the first shock of the league with the firmness that became his situation. He wrote a mean letter to the duke of Maine, and he

he employed the pope's nuncio, to beg his holiness to forgive his brother's death, and offered to the house of Lorrain the third of his kingdom. The duke's answer was, "I will never forgive this miscreant." When the bull of his excommunication, by the pope, was published, he was struck with visible dismay, because it was seconded by the outcries of the people against him as a murderer, and a traitor to God. The league had declared the old cardinal of Bourbon, king. An impeachment was formally drawn up against Henry, by the name of Henry of Valois, heretofore king of France and Poland, at the suit of the duke of Guise's widow, for the murder of her husband; and the clergy refused absolution to all who continued to acknowledge him as their king. The reconciliation between him and the king of Navarre, was the first step that re-inspired him with any confidence. Nicholas de Harley, lord of Sancy, by selling his own lands and jewels, brought to his assistance ten thousand Swiss, and three thousand five hundred Germans; so that Henry was now in a condition to have marched to the gates of Paris, which the king of Navarre said was the best step he could take for being absolved from his excommunication. He unfortunately, in his march thither, lost time in beating the duke of Aumale, and in taking Estampes, and some other places, which must have surrendered of course had he been master of Paris, for that capital was not invested before the last of July, when Henry took up his head quarters at St. Cloud, as the king of Navarre did his at Meudon.

The leaguers were not wanting to their own defence. who is Their general, the duke of Maine, posted himself with four assassinat- thousand men in the suburbs of St. Honore, and dispositions ed. were made for a vigorous defence, while the king was using every precaution for cutting off all their supplies of provisions. Notwithstanding the fury, and the numbers of the leaguers, they knew that Henry had a strong party in his capital, who would not fail to declare themselves as soon as the city was pinched by famine, which it must be in a few days; and this consideration, probably, suggested to some of their most desperate enthusiasts the thoughts of taking Henry off by assassination. One Jaques Clement, a Jacobine friar, about twenty-five years of age, whose brain had been turned by the preaching and denunciations of his party, and who thought that his murdering the king would secure him in the possession of heaven, was pitched upon for that purpose; and he undertook the assassination. Enthusiasm inspired him at once with resolution and cunning, and having procured a passport from the count de Brienne to the king's head quarters, he told la Guesle, the king's attorney general, that he had dispatches of the last importance, which he could deliver only into the king's own hand. As he had formerly been employed by the royalists on the like occasions, occasions, he was the less suspected, and la Guesle, introducing him to the king, Clement presented him with his dispatches. While Henry was reading them, the assassin drew a knife, which he had concealed in his sleeve, and stabbed the king in the belly, leaving the weapon in the wound, from whence Henry drew it out, and wounded Clement in the face, at the same time that la Guesle, beat him with the pomel of his sword to the ground, where he was incautiously dispatched by the other attendants.

Such are the most important circumstances of this detestable murder. The immediate death of the assassin gave rise to many groundless conjectures, as if Clement had not been the real murderer. But without entering into any minute disproof of those suspicions; we are to consider that Henry lived long enough after his wound to have discovered his real murderer, if he was any other than Clement. The physicians at first, had some hopes of his recovery; but the symptoms soon appearing mortal, the king of Navarre was sent for, and Henry, after tenderly embracing him, and declaring him his successor, expired in his arms, on the second of August, in the sixteenth year of his reign, and the thirty-ninth of his age. The indecent treatment which his dead body met with before its interment, gave some countenance to the surmises of his having received his death's wound from one of his domestics.

Henry owed his vices, and consequently, his misfortunes, to the councils he received from his mother. While he was young and in the field, out of her influence, he behaved well; but after his return from Poland, he fell into a state of mind, that partook equally of idiotism and fury. Danger alone could fix him in that courage and reason, which he possessed from nature; but he soon relapsed into his weaknesses. The great historian, de Thou, says, that he behaved like a hero, and an accomplished general, when he defended Tours. His wife, Louisa, of Lorraine, whom notwithstanding his unnatural vices he always treated well, survived him about twelve years. But his memory has, perhaps, suffered in some respects by his being equally detestable to the hugonots, as the Roman catholics.

Henry IV. surnamed the Great.

Descent of Henry IV. ROBERT VI. son of St. Lewis, having married the heiress of Bourbon, was succeeded by his son, Lewis, in whose favour, as we have already seen, Charles the Fair, erected the barony of Bourbon into a dutchy and peerage. Lewis was succeeded by his son, Peter, who is called the first duke of Bourbon. His son, Lewis, was renowned for his virtue and riches, in the reign of Charles VI. and and he was succeeded by his son, John, who died in 1434, and had for his successor, his son, Charles, whose son, John II. surnamed the Good, was created constable of France. He dying in 1488, he was succeeded by his brother, Peter, lord of Beaujeu, and he leaving only a daughter, the male line of the house of Bourbon became extinct in that branch, and the title returned to Charles de Bourbon, count of Vendosme, who was descended from a count de la March, who was son of the first duke of Bourbon. His son, Anthony de Bourbon, married Joan d'Albert, daughter and heiress of Henry, the first king of Navarre, and from that marriage was born Henry IV. who by the principles of the falic law, now succeeded to the crown of France; though he stood but in the twenty-second degree of relationship to his predecessor.

La Guesle published a circumstantial account of all he who is reckoned concerning the person of Clement, the murderer cognized of the late king; and many incidents concurred to put it by part of almost beyond a doubt, that the chiefs of the league in his army. Paris were privy to the assassination. Strong suspicions likewise arose that some persons even about the late king knew of the design. Those were alarming considerations to Henry, but he was so well served by Sanis, who acted as lieutenant colonel of the Swiss, that they took an oath of fidelity to him, and declared that they were ready to follow his fortunes; an unusual diffidence and uneasiness appeared among the Roman catholics in his army. Their heads, were the duke of Longueville, D'O, D'Enstranges, Dampieire, and others of poor abilities; but all of them of great influence. After consultation, they repaired to the king and acknowledged his title; but at the same time expressed their desire that he would turn Roman catholic. His answer to this perplexing question was, "That the change of religion was an important point, which he could not consider till he had revenged the barbarous murder of the late king." While he was yet speaking, Givry, one of his most faithful officers, came into the assembly, and said aloud, that none but cowards had the least thought of abandoning their king, and that the brave nobility who followed him had put off their mourning till they had revenged the late king's barbarous murder. The protestant and Swiss officers expressing their satisfaction at what Givry had declared; the catholics in general drew up a paper on the fourth of August, containing some articles for the security of their own religion, and the king signed it; upon which, all of them, but the duke of Epernon, took the oath of fidelity.

That duke was thought to be the proudest man in France; His negotiations and he withdrew his troops from those of the king on the frivolous pretence, that the marshals Biron, and d'Aumont, with England had signed the oath of fidelity before him. His withdrawing

ing struck a damp on the affairs of Henry, as he had been always personally attached to the late king, to whom he had done prodigious services. Henry soon saw the effects of his secession by the thinness of his army; and he found himself obliged to raise the siege of Paris, and to retire towards Normandy, that he might preserve his communication with England, the only power on which he could depend. He sent over Beauviour, as his ambassador to queen Elizabeth, to represent the deplorable state of his affairs, and to request a pecuniary assistance, and she instantly remitted him twenty-two thousand pounds; which he himself acknowledged was a greater sum than ever he had seen before. Not content with this, she signified by her letters to the governors of Calais, and the other sea-ports opposite to her coasts, that she would treat all the French as rebels who did not acknowledge Henry as their lawful sovereign. His affairs must have been irretrievably ruined without this seasonable assistance. The money secured the Swiss troops in his service; and the letters prevailed with the governors of Dieppe, and Caen to receive his troops. Elizabeth, did still more, for she sent Pallavicini, an able negotiator, to engage the German protestant princes to raise an army for Henry; she promising to contribute largely towards its payment, and lord Willoughby, her general, in the Low Countries, was ordered to march to his assistance with four thousand of her best troops.

Conduct
of the duke of Maine.

The Parisian leaguers offered to proclaim the duke of Maine king; but he declined that honour in favour of the cardinal of Bourbon, who was still a prisoner. Marshal Matignon held Bordeaux, as the marshal d'Aumont did Angiers, for Henry; but his army in Normandy did not amount to above eight thousand in the field. A secret jealousy which the duke of Maine had conceived against Philip II. of Spain, to whom many of the violent leaguers offered the crown of France, contributed to Henry's preservation; and the duke persuaded the leaguers to put him at the head of an army of thirty thousand men, with which he proposed to retake Dieppe, and to give the finishing blow to Henry's hopes. The army was soon raised; but when the duke carried it into Normandy he found the king entrenched behind a river, and under the cannon of the castle of Arques. There is some reason for believing that the duke of Maine was so distrustful of the consequences, that he did not act with a proper vigour during this campaign; for he had intelligence, that if the king was defeated, the marquis de Pont, eldest son of the duke of Lorraine, would declare himself king, which would infallibly ruin the catholic party, and deprive them of the king of Spain's powerful assistance in money. Orders were given, however, to attack the king in his entrenchments; and the German troops in the pay of the league made such an impression upon him, that Henry's person was in danger from one of their officers; but by his valour he repulsed the duke who is de- of Maine, who lost six hundred men, and retired towards feated. Paris. By this time, the lord Willoughby had advanced as far as Abbeville, and after the battle of Arques, he joined the king's army, which immediately marched to Paris.

German

The duke of Maine had carefully concealed the disgrace he had received at Arques; and the Parisians expected to have seen Henry brought through their streets as a prisoner, when they saw him appear at their gates as a conqueror. He had no artillery; but he was in hopes of carrying the city by storm. He attacked three of the suburbs, and the English stormed a bastion between St. Marcellus's gate, and the river, when the duke of Maine threw himself with his army into the city, and put an end to Henry's hopes of taking it.

As the French historians have, through a mean unpardonable jealousy, concealed the brave actions performed by the English on this memorable occasion; we are glad of so good an authority to correct them, as a letter under Henry's own hand, which he wrote to Elizabeth; the translation of which is as follows:

“MADAM,

“THE great share which your majesty has in our war, The bra- by the seasonable assistance you have given us, together very of with the obligations I am under to you for the care and the English good will you have shewn for my interests, makes it highly acknow- reasonable you should be acquainted with what passes here. ledged by I have therefore thought proper, after the success of the a letter alarm and consternation which I carried to Paris, of which from I had almost made myself master, to order the lord Beauvoir, Henry to as I do at present, to impart every thing to you. Elizabeth.

“You may, Madam, be entirely satisfied, that I have been so effectually served by your troops, and have had such convincing proofs of the good conduct and courage of the lord Willoughby, who is worthily seconded by all the other gentlemen, your subjects here, that they more and more do honour to your judgment in your choice of them, and encrease the many obligations I lie under already to your majesty. All I can add farther, and I do it with great good will, is, to declare, that I think myself bound to be more yours than my own, nor can my affection receive any addition to what I have long felt; all I am, and all I can do, is, without reserve, yours; therefore, most humbly kissing your hands, I beg that you will believe, that I shall be ever more yours than my own.

HENRY.

“Postscript, I assuredly expect the continuance of your good will, especially in my necessities.”

Henry,

He raises
the siege
of Paris.

Henry, after raising the siege of Paris, withdrew to Tours; while the duke of Maine formally proclaimed the cardinal of Bourbon, king, in Paris, by the name of Charles X. This step gave a fresh alarm to the council of sixteen, which still subsisted, and were in the Spanish interest. Being powerfully supported with money by Philip; whose view was to have his daughter, Clara Eugenia, proclaimed queen of France, they were very strong; but the duke of Maine, who was secretly their enemy, shewed amazing abilities in disconcerting them. Perceiving the pope's legate to be in the Spanish interest, he procured his holiness, instead of Philip, to be declared protector of the league; a step which the other party had no pretext to oppose, and he gave a mortal blow to the authority of the council of sixteen, in appointing, by virtue of his king's authority, a privy council, and by taking the seals from Montholon, and giving them to the archbishop of Lyons.

Henry's great safety, now, lay in the divisions of his enemies. The duke of Savoy intrigued with the parliament of Grenoble to be declared king of Arles; but he was disappointed by the duke de la Valette, who was firmly attached to Henry, and lost his life in his service. His brother, the duke of Epernon, loved his money and power too well to share either of them with Henry, by submitting to a reconciliation; but he carried on an incessant war against the leaguers, by which he served the royal cause. The duke of Maine, however, took Pontoise, and besieged Meulun, Henry relieved it, and besieged Dreux in his turn. The duke of Maine being reinforced by four thousand horse, and three thousand infantry, all of them choice troops from the duke of Parma's army, and commanded by count Egmont, advanced to raise the siege. Henry hearing of his approach called his chief officers together, and told them that he could lose no honour in abandoning a siege that he might fight a battle; but he found that his army did not amount to above ten thousand men, while that under the duke of Maine was sixteen thousand strong.

of Juri.

The siege being raised, Henry met his enemies at Juri, and in a short memorable speech, he made before the engagement, he told them, "If you lose your colours, repair to where you see my white plume of feathers; you will always find it in the road to honour and glory." Henry gained the victory, chiefly, by his personal valour. The Spanish troops were routed, and their general killed. The duke of Maine is said to have lost as many men as the king's army amounted to, besides his baggage, and four pieces of artillery, which were all he had. Some of the French infantry joined a body of the Swiss troops after the rout, and formed themselves into a hallow square; but Henry offered them quarter in a manner so noble and gallant, that that all of them came over to his service. The victory, next to Henry's own valour, was chiefly owing to the skillful conduct of marshal Biron, who, though he did not engage, made an excellent use of the division he commanded. "Your majesty (said he to the king after the battle was over) this day acted the part of marshal Biron incomparably well; and I did my best to act that of the king." The duke of Maine escaped over the Seine, by persuading the people of Mante that Henry was defeated and killed.

The want of money retarded Henry's progress for a few days; but having got a remittance from England, he broke off a sham negotiation he had entered into with the duke of Paris, Maine, and marching to Paris, he entirely blocked up that capital. The old cardinal of Bourbon, the mock Charles X. had died in his prison on the day the battle of Juri was fought; but the leaguers continued to recognize his authority, and to coin money with his effigies. They had made the duke of Nemours the governor of Paris, and the death of their king seemed only to render them, and the doctors of the Sorbonne, the more determined to oppose Henry de Bourbon, as he was called. The legate formed a regiment of thirteen hundred ecclesiastics; but Henry must have taken Paris by famine, had he not suffered the useless mouths to pass through his camp rather than turn them back to perish in the city. Though Philip II. was far from being pleased with the conduct of the duke of Maine, and the leaguers, yet, upon the death of the cardinal of Bourbon, he sent repeated orders to his general, the duke of Parma, to march to the relief of Paris. Henry had intelligence of this, and demanded from queen Elizabeth another supply of four thousand English, who had served in the Low Countries, together with three pieces of cannon. It appears from Henry's own letters, and those of the marquis of Brandenburg, one of the wisest prince in Germany, that Henry owed his victory at Juri to the English auxiliaries already in his service, and she agreed to send four thousand men to Normandy, under the earl of Essex, and three thousand to Bretagne, under Sir John Norris, both which provinces had been already invaded by the Spaniards. Notwithstanding this generous assistance, and the repeated remittances of money which Elizabeth sent to Henry, his affairs upon the march of the duke of Parma towards Paris had a most wretched aspect. He could not suffer his soldiers to live at free quarters; and he was so far from having money for keeping them together that he could not afford himself decent cloathing, and for want of a dinner he sometimes invited himself to other people's tables.

The taking of Paris would have given a more favourable turn to his affairs; but he was disappointed in that hope by the excellent measures which the duke of Parma took for its relief. Henry was obliged to raise the siege of Paris, and march towards Parma.

towards the end of August; and this was of infinite prejudice to his interest. The duke of Savoy, after taking Frejus and Antibes, was declared protector of Provence; and the pope, who was by birth his catholic majesty's subject, persecuted Henry, by his fulminations, with the greatest inveteracy. Henry, notwithstanding all his discouragements, continued still indefatigable, and made two attempts to take Paris by surprize, but was disappointed in both. He had once more recourse to Elizabeth, who pressed the government of the United Provinces to give such a diversion to the duke of Parma as might disable him from again entering France with his army. She, at the same time, sent him fresh supplies both of men and money; but it was on the express conditions, that the taxes and gabelles about Rouen and Havre should be assigned to her commissaries for her repayment, and that he should immediately form the siege of Rouen. Henry consented to all she required, but was in no condition to perform the terms; and she threatened to recall the earl of Essex and all her troops out of France. Henry had too much understanding to think she was in earnest, and he prevailed with her to suffer Sir Roger Williams and his regiment, which he always kept about his own person, to remain in his service.

It was owing to them that, in the year 1591, he surprised Louvieres; but we find, at this time, that Elizabeth had engaged herself for vast sums to the German princes, with whom her minister, Pallavicini, had bargained for eleven thousand troops to be employed in Henry's service. We mention those circumstances the more particularly, as they can be proved by letters still extant from Henry himself, and because all the obligations which the house of Bourbon lies under to the crown of England are most ungratefully suppressed by the French historians.

Elizabeth Henry would gladly have drawn Norris, and the English displeased auxiliaries, from the sea-coasts, to serve him in the more with Hen- inland parts of France; but finding Elizabeth averse to that, ry. he was forced to begin his operations in Normandy. He intended to take Laballe, but he was repulsed: the English, however, took Chatillon, Cinquesance, with several other places, and plundered Aumale. Elizabeth gave orders to the earl of Essex to undertake no service but that of the siege of Rouen; but the duke of Longueville, Henry's governor of Picardy, persuaded him to undertake that of Noyou, which he carried in sight of the duke of Maine and his army; and his success somewhat pacified Elizabeth. But we are now to review the internal state of Henry's affairs.

the war. During his operations in Normandy, he had given the seals to Chiverney, and had taken prisoner the bishop of Evreux, upon whom was found the copy of a treatise he had composed in defence of the murder of Henry III. for which he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment. The parliament

ment of Chalons ordered all the papal proceedings against Henry to be burnt by the common executioner, and a price to be set upon the nuntio's head; and Henry succeeded, with great difficulty, in taking Chartres. On the other hand, the young duke of Guise had escaped out of prison, where he had been confined ever since his father's death; and the Parisians, who were again guided by the council of sixteen, were inclinable to put themselves under his command, and to nominate the king of Spain for their protector; while the young cardinal of Bourbon, son to Lewis, prince of Conde, was a competitor for the crown, as being the catholic head of the house of Bourbon. Henry very critically became master of all their proceedings, and sent the original papers to the duke of Maine in Picardy. The duke, it is probable, had, long before this, repented of the lengths he had gone; but had persevered, because he found it dangerous to retract. He now appeared compliable with Henry's desire; and they agreed to send the president, Jeannin, whom both of them could trust, to sound his catholic majesty. Jeannin made his report, with great plainness, that, when Philip talked of Paris, Lyons, and the other great cities of France, he called them, "My towns;" and that he spoke of his daughter, and her husband, the archduke Ernest, as "queen and king of France." He was encouraged in his ambitious notions by the proceedings of the council of sixteen; who, on the fifteenth of November, had hanged their president, Brissot, and two of their counsellors, in prison, because they did not think them sufficiently in the Spanish interest. The duke of Maine considered himself now as on the brink of ruin; and returning to Paris with his army, after seeming to make up matters with the leaguers, he seized four of the council of sixteen in their beds, and hanged them in his own hall. Bussy le Clerc then delivered up to him the bastille, and died afterwards in poverty at Paris.

Henry did not now consider the duke of Maine to be the which is same irreconcilable enemy as before; but Henry was, at continued this time, on the point of losing Elizabeth's friendship; by Elizabeth and, had it not been for the affection she had for the earl Essex, who was a friend to him and his cause, it is more than probable she would have recalled her troops, on account of his trifling so long with her by delaying the siege of Rouen. Essex was passionately fond of action; and, by his influence in Henry's council, it was agreed upon, that the siege of Rouen should be formed by himself, the duke of Montpensier, and marshal Biron. Even this agreement was broken by Henry's generals; and Essex trespassed so far upon Elizabeth's partiality for him, as to assist Biron in undertaking the siege of Gournay. That of Rouen was, at last, formed upon Elizabeth's assurance of paying Henry's foreign troops. His army, in the whole, consisted of about thirty-five thousand men; but his great dependance was upon the English, who were six thousand in number. The earl of Essex did wonders in his own person, and stormed the fort on Mount St. Catharine; which he kept against all the enemy's efforts. Henry took upon himself the command of the siege, and exposed himself equally with the meanest soldier in his army; but he was not now master in his camp. His Roman catholic, and even protestant, officers, thought, (perhaps with some reason) that, if the city was taken, it would be plundered by the English; and were so averse to the service, that the duke of Parma had time, once more, to assemble his troops and to march to the relief of Rouen; when the governor, Villars, one of the best officers in France, was on the point of capitulating. Henry's person was never in greater danger than on this occasion; and, had it not been for the valour of his English auxiliaries, he must have been killed or taken prisoner. He left marshal Biron, with a part of his army, to continue the siege; and he attempted to surprize the duke of Parma: but that general was Henry's superior in the art of war; and, instead of being surprized, he opened a communication between his army and Rouen.

The siege of Rouen raised by the duke of Parma. The cautious proceeding of the duke of Parma, who was not to be forced to a battle, made Henry lose all patience. He rode about like a common dragoon; and, though he was now at the head of an army of forty thousand men, he was obliged to be in a manner inactive. The march of the duke of Parma, and the duke of Maine, who had now joined him, and whose army was far inferior in number to that of Henry, was full of difficulties and dangers; but the excellent order and discipline introduced by that great Italian general, who behaved with as much ease as if he had been in the midst of a court, surmounted all obstacles, tho' he was carried unarmed in an open sedan. Henry attacked the van of his army, near Aumale, with so much fury, and with such a disregard to discipline, that he himself was wounded in the reins; and it was with difficulty he was brought off by the duke of Nevers and by his English auxiliaries. At last, in the beginning of March, the duke of Parma threw succours into Rouen, and actually separated his army. Henry took that opportunity to resume the siege, and Villars informed the two dukes, who had taken Neufchatel, that he must capitulate if not relieved within a few days. The duke of Parma reassembled his army, and marched against Henry; who, after a five months continuance of the siege, was obliged to raise it. The duke of Parma was for fighting a decisive battle, but the duke of Maine opposed it; and, with their joint forces, they besieged and took Caudebec, where the duke of Parma was wounded.

Henry

Henry instructed his ambassador, Beauvoir, to magnify to Henry in Elizabeth every circumstance that was in his favour; but to great danger conceal and disguise whatever was otherwise: and the sup- ger. plies she continued to give Henry had rendered his army more numerous than ever; and he undertook the siege of Ivetot in the sight of his enemies. In reconnoitering their camp, attended only by a troop of light-horse and an hundred and fifty foot, but most of them English, he was surrounded by a strong detachment of the enemy. In a letter of Henry to Elizabeth, in which he gives an account of the action that ensued, he says it was one of the most dreadful that ever was seen; “and, madam,” continues he, “I can say, with great justice, that your troops behaved with so much intrepidity and courage, that it was impossible for my Frenchmen to equal them.”

Being, with great difficulty, disengaged from this encounter, Henry prepared to be revenged on the two dukes; and took his measures so well, that young Biron demanded of his father the command of six or seven thousand men to finish their destruction. “Son,” replied the old man, “thou and I must then go and plant cabbages at Biron.” The Seine was, at this time, on the rear of the duke of Parma’s army, and considerably broad. He was in no condition to fight, and his troops had no subsistence; so that it was expected every hour that he would have demanded a capitulation. In this situation, he assembled, or built, a great number of boats; and, in the space of half a day, he ran up two redoubts on the opposite bank of the river, which favoured his retreat across it with all his troops. That great soldier thought this operation the most masterly he had ever performed; and he sent a trumpet to Henry to know what he thought of it. Henry, in his vexation of spirit, at being obliged to remain little better than a spectator while his enemies escaped him, answered peevishly, “That he could give no opinion, because he was not used to retreats.” The duke of Parma continued his march, took Espernai, and returned to the Low Countries.

The secret views of all the parties concerned in this war, excepting those of Henry, which could not be mistaken, were averse to each other. The duke of Maine hated and dreaded both the Spaniards and the leaguers, but durst not close with Henry. Philip II. on pretence of religion, intended to render France a province of his crown. Elizabeth assisted Henry chiefly with a view of keeping the Spanish armies employed in France; and both the Roman catholic and protestant officers, who served for pay, as most of them did, dreaded the return of peace. The dukes of Epernon and la Valette, Lefdiguieres, and other great officers of the provinces, were too fond of independency to see royalty again re-established under such a prince as Henry; and a vast party in the kingdom, consisting of those who both favoured and opposed the league, were for the establishment of a commonwealth.

Marshal Biron
killed.

The duke de Mercœur defeated the princes of Conti and Dombes, who commanded for Henry on the frontiers of Anjou. The king retook Caudebec; and, renewing the blockade of Rouen, he besieged, and took, Espernai; but with the loss of his best general, marshal Biron, whose head was shot off by a cannon-ball. It was thought, that, being disappointed in some ambitious views, he was willing that Henry should be sensible of his importance by his inactivity at the siege of Rouen, and in opposing the duke of Parma. His loss was, in some measure, replaced by the viscount de Turenne; who, by Henry's interest, married the heiress of the house of la Marck; and, in her right, became duke of Bouillon, to the vast disappointment of the house of Lorraine. He was an acquisition of great consequence to the king, as he possessed the strong town of Sedan, and its principality, as well as the dutchy of Bouillon. The marshal of Lorraine had besieged Beaumont for the league; but the duke of Bouillon, now made a marshal of France, beat him, relieved the place, and took all his baggage and artillery. The duke de Joyeuse was, in like manner, beaten, with the loss of two thousand men, and his own life, by de Themmes, who commanded for the king in Languedoc; and Lesdiguières drove the duke of Savoy out of France, and pursued him almost to the gates of Turin. The duke de la Valette being now dead, was succeeded by his brother, the duke of Epernon, as governor of Provence; and took Antibes from the Spaniards, as well as drove them from before Bayonne.

Services of Eliza- beth to
Henry.

The prince of Anhalt then commanded the German auxiliaries in Henry's service; but they proving too expensive for his finances, he was obliged to dismiss them. Queen Elizabeth, however, prevailed with the prince to keep them together, in case their assistance should be farther wanted. She had, at this time, above twelve thousand men in France under Norris, and was perpetually upbraiding Henry for leaving his sea-coasts, opposite to England, disfurnished of troops; but his situation became, at this time, extremely critical.

The duke of Parma ordered to march into France.

The immense sums furnished by Philip, to keep up his party among the leaguers, had such an effect, that he flattered himself, by the pope's assistance, to procure the salic law being set aside by a decree of the states of France, and his own daughter to be declared queen. It was with this view that, notwithstanding his engagements with the arch-duke Albert, he had kept her still unmarried, that he might give her to a prince of the house of Lorraine, or some other, who might be more agreeable to the French nation. The throne, in the sense of the league, was still vacant. Henry most certainly had a correspondence with the duke of Maine for defeating the Spanish party in their views on the crown; but but he durst not entirely break with him, nor even appear to distrust him. The pope had taken upon him to issue his orders for the meeting of the states of France; and the Spanish party insisted upon their assembling either at Soissons or Rheims. The duke of Maine stuck to their meeting at Paris; but the duke of Parma had orders from his master once more to march into France with his army; and the Spanish agents among the leaguers were authorized to declare, that, if his daughter was chosen queen, he would support her title with millions of money, and an army of sixty thousand men.

The duke of Maine was saved from his distress by the death of the duke of Parma, as he was assembling his army. The death of that great prince, the ablest, but the worst supported, general of his time, was equally providential for the leaguers as for the royalists. All Henry's resources, but in the queen of England, were exhausted. His protestant subjects had served him faithfully; but they, as well as he, were miserably poor, and their numbers greatly reduced. The best head among them, Rosne, afterwards duke of Sully, advised Henry to change his religion; and his Roman catholic subjects, though they had hitherto served him with fidelity, were somewhat peremptory in desiring him to declare himself on that head; and Henry, perceiving his ruin to be inevitable if he did not, gave them such an answer as left them in no doubt of his compliance; which was a blow the leaguers dreaded the most of any.

On the twenty-sixth of January, 1592, the states of France assembled at Paris, being convoked by a sensible, elegant, and moderate edict, published by the duke of Maine, and a rash, intemperate mandate by the legate. When they proceeded to business, the legate sat as president; but the royal chair of state was left vacant. He and the Spanish faction proposed, that the assembly should enter into an association not to acknowledge the king of Navarre as their sovereign, even though he should profess himself a Roman catholic.

The duke of Maine, when strengthened by the royal party and the more moderate leaguers, was sensible that his interest in the assembly was superior to that of the Spaniards. He opposed the legate's proposition with great weight and dignity, and the archbishop of Lyons shewed that it was derogatory to his holiness. While they were intent on those debates, a paper of propositions was sent, by the royal party of the Roman catholics, to the count de Belin, governor of Paris, for a conference to be held, near that capital, by the deputies on both sides; and the duke of Maine, against the opinion of the violent leaguers, remitted it to the consideration of the states; but had so much interest as to prevail with them to do nothing decisive upon it till he had had an interview with the duke of Feria, Philip's ambassador, who was at Soissons.

They accordingly met, and both of them treated each other with haughtiness. Feria proposed the repeal of the salic law, and that the infanta should be immediately declared queen of France. The duke of Maine answered, that kingdoms were not to be acquired by promises. Some of the more moderate Spanish ministers made the duke of Feria sensible of the duke of Maine's influence in the states; upon which he offered him the sovereignty of Burgundy, to himself and his family, for ever; the government of Picardy for his life; the command of all the troops of France, with the title of lieutenant general, and the payment of, or security for, immense sums of money. It is uncertain whether the duke of Maine was not touched with those proposals; and, after taking Noyon, he introduced the duke of Feria into the assembly of the states. He there renewed his violent propositions for the repeal of the salic law, and the election of the infanta and the archduke Albert, to be king and queen of France. Both motions were rejected, and the parliament of Paris issued a solemn arret, declaring it to be treason against the constitution of the kingdom, even to admit of any treaty for transferring the crown to foreigners, or for the repeal of the salic law. The duke of Maine appeared to be offended with this officiousness of the parliament; and the duke of Feria, in his master's name, proposed the duke of Guise as a husband for the infanta.

The repeal of the salic law opposed. It was not, perhaps, at this time, in the power of the two dukes, though they had been united, to have carried their point against the salic law. It was now known that Henry was, for form sake, under the instructions of the bishops for reconciling himself to the church of Rome. The conferences that had been proposed between his deputies and those of the states, had been agreed to, and were actually going on at Surenne, the archbishop of Lyons being the first commissioner for the states, and the archbishop of Bourges for the king.

On the twenty-eighth of July, affairs took a sudden turn, by Henry formally hearing mass at St. Dennis, and receiving absolution from the archbishop of Bourges. He was then besieging Dreux; but the king no sooner declared himself a Roman catholic, than a truce for three months, from the first of August, was agreed on. The enthusiastic leaguers had foreseen this stroke, and had provided against it; for they had spirited up one Pierre Barrier, a waterman, to assassinate Henry. The plot was discovered by one Seraphin Bianchi, a Dominican friar, and one Brancaleon, a domestic of the queen-mother; by whose activity the fellow was apprehended, and executed, after confessing who his accomplices among the leaguers were.

The

The face of affairs was now changed in favour of the king, whose virtues must have won the hearts of all but the most detestable enthusiasts. He had received a most severe letter from Elizabeth, when his conversion was notified to her by Mornay, his ambassador at her court; but he knew that her interest would keep her firm in his alliance. The marshal Matignon had, by the assistance of some English and Dutch ships, beaten a fleet of Spaniards, which, however, afterwards relieved Blaye; and Lesdiguières had cut in pieces three thousand Spaniards upon the frontiers of Savoy; after which he marched against the duke of Epernon, who tyrannized over the people of Provence, without declaring for the king. The duke of Montmorenci continued to be master of Languedoc, where he preserved matters in perfect tranquillity; and, upon Henry's conversion, he did him such excellent service, that he was rewarded with the constable's sword. The chief opposition Henry now met with, was from the violent protestants, whom he had given leave to assemble; but they were prompted by their zeal to present him with fourteen articles, which he could not comply with without the ruin of his affairs.

The more the royal cause prospered, the more strongly Intrigues did the duke of Maine link himself with the Spanish party, of the who now threw out to him the bait of the infant's marriage duke of with his son. This proposal carried him great lengths; Maine. and Henry discovered that a treaty was on foot between him and the Spaniards, who were to furnish him with a body of eighteen thousand men. Henry was unwilling to exasperate the duke of Maine beyond all measure; but he informed old secretary Villeroy, one of the ablest men in France, and the president Jeannin, who had managed the private correspondence between him and the duke, of his new engagements. The duke, on the other hand, had interest enough with the states to prevail upon them to renew their oath of union in favour of the Roman catholic religion, and to receive the decrees of the council of Trent; but with such a salvo in favour of the Gallican church, as rendered the edict of very little effect.

It was about this time that the duke of Nemours, the duke of Maine's brother by the mother, was encouraged to hope for the infant in marriage, and attempted to form an independent government in the Lyonnois, by fortifying that city. The archbishop of Lyons counteracted him by the duke of Maine's influence, and the people sent the duke of Nemours prisoner to Pierre Encise. Soon after this, secretary Villeroy was so thoroughly convinced of the duke of Maine's dangerous practices, that he broke off all correspondence with him, and retired to his son's government at Pontoise.

Henry had now reduced Dreux; but the languor of the Difficul-Roman catholics, of his party, even after his conversion, ties of Henry at was amazing. No places of great importance submitted to the court him, through the general opinion which they entertained of Rome of the duke of Maine's good intentions, joined, perhaps, after his to the distrust they had of the sincerity of Henry's conversion. The marquis de Vitri was the first nobleman who had the courage to reconcile himself to Henry, in the most gallant manner. He had, like the duke of Epernon, left the king, but had joined the league, and was made governor of Meaux. No sooner did Henry declare his conversion, than he ordered his garrison to evacuate the town; and prevailed upon the magistrates, to whom he resigned the keys, to send them to Henry by their deputies, whom he received as his children; and, at their desire, he replaced the marquis de Vitri in his government.

Vol. X.
p. 297.

We have already seen the dispositions of the court of Rome, with regard to Henry's cause. Clement VIII. had been his violent enemy; and for some time refused to admit into his presence Henry's ambassadors, cardinal de Gondi, and the marquis of Pisani; and even after he was inclined to have given him absolution, he was overawed by the Spanish faction. Henry had made the most humiliating advances to be reconciled to his holiness. For that purpose he employed, at the court of Rome, various agents, and particularly the famous Arnold d'Offat, afterwards cardinal, and one of the ablest negotiators of his age. The cardinal found the forms of the court of Rome so intolerably slow, and the pope himself so mysteriously dilatory, that Henry sent the duke of Nevers, at the head of a pompous embassy, to quicken his holiness, to whom he talked with great freedom. In short, he rendered Clement at length sensible that he was in danger of losing two thirds of the kingdom of France. The marquis de Vitri, and the people of Meaux, had addressed the inhabitants of Paris to follow their example. Charenton, and many places about Paris, were reduced by Henry; and what was still of more consequence, the people of Lyons declared for him, without giving their archbishop the merit of being instrumental in their submission.

His progress against the leaguers.

The spirit of the kingdom ran now so much in favour of Henry, that the marshal de la Chastre abandoned the league, and delivered up to Henry his government of the Orleannois, and Berry, with the city of Orleans; as d'Alincourt, son to Villeroy, did Pontoise. Rheims, however, was still in the power of the leaguers; and Henry, who was sensible of what importance a coronation was to his title, resolved that his should be performed at Chartres, which it accordingly was, on the twenty-seventh of February, with as much solemnity as the confusion of the times could admit of. The effects of his coronation were so amazing, that the cardinal legate, to stop them, published a mandate, declaring declaring the pope to be so far from receiving the duke of Nevers, as Henry's ambassador, that he resolved never to give him absolution. This intemperate zeal ruined the affairs of the league. The Roman catholic royalists were now convinced that the pope, and not Henry, was to blame, and that the intention of Philip was to involve them in a perpetual war; for which reasons they repaired to Henry's standards in greater numbers than ever.

By this time, Henry had once more blockaded Paris, and the duke of Maine retired with his family to Soissons; but left the command of Paris to the count de Brisac. There was then in Paris a garrison of three thousand Spaniards besides mercenaries in their pay, and a French garrison likewise, many of whom were devoted to the league. Though the count de Brisac had given the duke of Maine the strongest assurances of his defending the capital against Henry, yet he found it impracticable, and soon formed connections with the royalists within the city for delivering it up to the king. Their heads were the president, le Maître; the attorney general, Molé; the provost of the merchants, Lullier; and the sheriff, L'Anglois. To disguise their consultations from the Spaniards, and the violent leaguers, Brisac pretended to have a violent quarrel with his brother-in-law, St. Luc; and he ordered the new gate to be strongly guarded under the sheriff L'Anglois, till it could be walled up, because, as he observed, it was the most commodious for the entrance of the king's troops. Matters, however, were not carried on with so much secrecy as to prevent the duke of Feria, and the Spanish general, don Diego d'Ibarra, from suspecting what was transacting, and the count of Brisac ran the risk of being stabbed by their officers. He acted with vast address, and disengaging himself from their company, he made such dispositions that the king's army was next morning, by five o'clock, admitted into the city without opposition, and almost without bloodshed; for not above sixty or seventy obstinate enthusiasts, (who refused to call out vive le roy) were cut in pieces.

The cardinal legate was sick in bed, when he heard of this catastrophe, which affected him so much, that he instantly expired. Though Henry had a right to have treated the Spaniards as prisoners of war, yet he gave them leave to depart, and jocosely sent his compliments to their master by the generals, and told them, that he never again expected to see them in Paris. Henry, the day of his entering his capital, heard mass, dined, and kept his court in public, as if he had resided there for years before; and in a few hours the tranquility and traffic of the city were entirely restored. On the thirtieth of March, the parliament repealed all the acts that had been made in prejudice of the royal authority, since the death of the late king; and the heads heads of the university, with the violent doctors of the Sorbonne implored his pardon on their knees, and retracted all their seditious decrees, and proceedings.

successes
in other parts of France.*

The capital being thus secured, Henry turned his thoughts towards Rouen, which was still governed by Villars, who had so bravely defended it before. He was among the other French generals of those days who looked upon a government as a life rent, of which they could not be divested without receiving a valuable consideration. He had been created admiral of France, and he demanded of the king four hundred thousand crowns, a pension of sixteen thousand livres, the continuance of his government, and his office of admiral, with many other augmentations of his power, and independency. Henry, to please queen Elizabeth, who could not be easy while Rouen was in the hands of the leaguers, granted him all he demanded. He gave young Biron a marshal's baton, and received the submission of the duke of Elbuef, the governor of Poitou. The marshal d'Aumont was ordered to take under his command the English troops in Bretagne, and he made himself master of St. Malo, and Morlaix. He next laid siege to Crodon, which, by the help of Sir Martin Forbisher, he took from the Spaniards, who were all put to death. The attack of that fort, which was erected at the entry of the bay of Brest, was fatal to Sir Martin Forbisher, who died of a wound he received there.

The reduction of Champagne under Henry's power was attended with remarkable circumstances. The government of that province had been granted to St. Paul, whom the duke of Maine had made a marshal of France; but he was killed by the duke of Guise in a private quarrel upon the streets of Rheims. The people of the province immediately chose the duke for their governor, and he accepted of the terms of submission prescribed him by Henry, who soon after gave him the government of Provence, out of which Lesdiguiere had driven the duke of Epernon. The duke of Lorraine now considered the affairs of the league as desperate, and made his terms with Henry. Amiens declared for him after he had besieged and taken Laon; and Cambray likewise submitted.

humbled.

The successes of Henry humbled the haughtiness of the pope; but increased that of Philip. His holiness privately advised d'Ossat to wink at his connivance with the deputies of the leaguers, and promised that, at a proper time, he would give his master absolution. Philip, on the other hand, omitted no means, public or private, to distress him; and Henry, at last, resolved to declare war against him, and to attack his Low Countries; for such was the peculiar situation of Henry, that though daily hostilities were committed between the French and the Spaniards, yet no declared war subsisted between the two nations. It is thought, that beside besides the public motives which inclined him to this step, he was influenced by the famous Gabrielle d'Estrees, his mistress, whom he loved to a degree of distraction, and who wanted a provision for her son. The duke of Bouillon, who was now a widower, had views in favour of the prince of Orange, and advised Henry to the war; while some of his other generals had motives of ambition or rapine.

While Henry was consulting upon this great affair, the Henry Jesuits, by their diabolical doctrines, were daily exciting attempted their votaries to assassinate him. One John Chastel, a youth to be of no more than nineteen years of age, the son of a rich assassin-draper, but weak brained and overheated by their discourses, ed. thought he could purchase the pardon of all his sins, by murdering Henry. With this view he repaired to the Louvre, and aimed a blow at the king's throat with a knife; but by Henry's stooping to embrace a nobleman, he received it on his mouth, where it beat out one of his teeth. He was immediately seized, and he avowed the fact, which he said was meritorious, because the king had not yet received absolution from the pope. He was condemned to death and executed. As he had received his education among the Jesuits, his tutor, Gueret, and one father Guignard, were apprehended. Gueret stood the torture without making any confession, and was banished the kingdom. Among Guignard's papers, were found some treatises justifying the doctrine of king-killing for heresy, for which he was hanged; but he could not be brought to ask pardon of the king, or to acknowledge that he had offended him. The same pernicious doctrine was found to be common to all the Jesuits, for which they were banished France; as were Chastel's father and mother, their house was demolished, and a pillar of infamy erected, where it stood. The parliaments of Bordeaux, and Tholouse, refused to second that of Paris, and the other parliaments of France, in this expulsion of the Jesuits; and nine years after, Henry, for political reasons, consented to their being recalled.

Gabrielle d'Estrees, is said to have been a weak woman; He settles but she was entirely mistress of Henry's affections, and his affairs. secretly governed the most important measures of his life. It was owing to her suggestions, that, at this time, he Vol. X. formed the design of conquering Franche Comte, which he p. 297. designed to give to her son; but, under the protection of the Swiss cantons, who were to be its lords paramount. In the mean while, pope Gregory pronounced Henry's absolution, in the persons of Perron and d'Ossat; but it had not the expected effect upon his affairs. Biron had been successful in Picardy; tho' a number of places in that province were still in the duke of Maine's hands. The duke of Nemours had escaped out of Pierre Encise, and, by the duke Savoy's assistance, he had surprized Vienne, and was attempting to block up Lyons; but he died of heart-break, after being being defeated by Montmorenci. The duke of Maine soon after lost Dijon, the capital of Burgundy, where his chief force then lay; and Henry, after settling his affairs at Paris, where he declared the prince of Conti president of the council, prepared to open the campaign in person for the conquest of the Franche Compté. The whole of his conduct, on this occasion, was dictated by his extravagant passion for his mistress; for while he was in Burgundy he received certain advice, that Velasco, constable of Castile, had joined the duke of Maine, with an army of fifteen thousand Spaniards. The castle of Dijon, which Henry had ordered to be besieged, still held out, as did that of Talan; and so impatient was he to make his promise good to his mistress, that while his army was marching to its rendezvous, he fell in, at the head of no more than two hundred horse, with the duke of Maine's van guard. Had that duke been able to have persuaded the constable to move, Henry must have been killed, or taken prisoner; but by a most amazing exertion of valour, he defended himself so well, at the head of his little troop, that he gave time for a body of eight hundred of his horse to come up, and disengage him.

The duke of Maine The duke of Maine, thro' the inactivity of the Spaniards, by which Henry's troops had reduced two castles, saw that leaves the the Spaniards were resolved to fight only for themselves; Spaniards. and Henry, who could not be ignorant of his sentiments, offered him a truce of three months, as he was on the point of retiring into Savoy. The duke accepted of it, and at Henry's request he went to Chalons, with a full resolution of employing the time of the truce in treating of peace. Henry, after the separation of the duke of Maine from the Spanish army, might very possibly have reduced Franche Compté; but he had been so blinded by his passion, that he had not secured the Swiss cantons in his interest; so that all he could do was to ravage the country which he intended to conquer. He went to Lyons, where he was magnificently entertained by the people, and their archbishop, who had been so serviceable to the duke of Maine. He there received the places which were held in Anjou, and Maine, by Bois-Dauphin, and returned to him the baton of marshal, that had been conferred upon him by the duke of Maine, whose authority Henry disallowed of. While he resided at Lyons, he concluded a truce with the duke of Savoy; but he expressed great indignation, when he found by Lefdiguieres, that the insolent duke of Epernon had recovered his interest in Provence, by means of a large pension paid him, monthly, by the king of Spain.

Conduct of queen Elizabeth. Queen Elizabeth took umbrage at Henry's expedition into Franche Compté; and it was with the utmost difficulty that his minister, Chevalier, prevailed on her not to recal her troops out of Bretagne, and Picardy, where the Spaniards under the Conde de Fuentes, were making an alarming progress.

gress. The duke of Nevers, the marshal de Bouillon, the count of St. Paul, and the admiral Villars, commanded for Henry. The dislike of the three latter to the duke of Nevers, perhaps, was detrimental to Henry's affairs. Fuentes, who had under him fifteen thousand men, took Catalet, and laid siege to Dourlens. Henry's generals undertook to relieve it; but were defeated by the duke of Aumale; and the admiral, Villars, who was taken prisoner, with some others, were murdered in cold blood, for having abandoned the league. The parliament of Paris imputed this barbarity to the duke of Aumale, and he was therefore proclaimed a traitor, with the highest marks of ignominy. To counterbalance those misfortunes, Humiere, another of Henry's generals, surprized, but with the loss of his life, the strong town of Ham, and put the garrison, consisting of sixteen hundred men, to the sword. Henry hearing of the progress of Fuentes, set out for Picardy; but was met on the road by the duke of Nevers, who informed him, that the Spaniards had taken Cambray likewise; that Artois, as well as Picardy, was in the utmost danger, and that the king, with the force he had, could do little for their relief. The desponding manner in which the duke (who was reckoned one of the worthiest, as well as bravest men in France) spoke, drew from Henry an answer, which affected the duke so much, that it broke his heart in a few days. Henry finding himself unable to regain Cambray, besieged la Fere, and sent over Lomeni, to assist Chevalier in soliciting queen Elizabeth for a new recruit of forces. That princess thought herself, with some reason, ill-treated by Henry, and she gave Lomeni so tart an answer, that he upbraided her with the loss of Cambray. Not chusing, however, that Henry should be obliged to make peace with Spain, she ordered her lord high admiral to fit out a fleet for his assistance; but it was impossible for him to put to sea.

In the month of January, the long expected accommodation took place with the duke of Maine, who, to the amazement of the world, obtained far better terms than the state of his affairs promised him. He treated as the head of a party, and therefore, in some degree, of equality with the king. He, and all his followers, were restored to their estates; an oblivion of all that was past was stipulated both for him and them; the king undertook to discharge three hundred thousand crowns of his private, and all his public debts; he was made governor of the isle of France, and obtained, by way of security, the towns of Seure, Chalons, and Soissons; and he and his friends were absolved from all imputation of the late king's death. Henry had many reasons, public, as well as personal, to induce him to this accommodation. He detached his most powerful subject from his alliance with Philip, and made a friend of a man, whom he knew had great qualities to recommend commend him ; and who, notwithstanding all his demerits, had saved France from becoming a province of Spain. In fact, the duke became, from that time, an admirer of the king's virtues, and a faithful subject ; while Henry treated him ever after, on the footing of the most intimate friendship. It was about this time, that Henry created Gabrielle d'Estrees, dutchess de Beaufort, and gave her the marquise of Monceaux.

The reconciliation of the duke of Maine with Henry had great effects. On the death of the duke of Joyeuse, his brother, who had betaken himself to a convent, and quitted it to serve the league, was made governor of Tholouse, which he now delivered up to Henry. The duke of Nemours made his submissions likewise ; and the duke of Guise, Henry's governor of Provence, surpris'd Marseilles, which was held by the Spaniards ; and when Henry heard that Marseilles was recovered, he is said to have exclaimed, " I am a king at last." His placable behaviour to the duke of Maine, and his other enemies, encouraged the duke of Epernon to present himself before him, and to demand the government of the Limosin ; which was granted him. This easiness was censured in Henry as weakness ; and he is accused of having been more generous to his enemies than grateful to his friends ; not to mention that the duke had treated him with personal indignities.

Calais.

Of all the king's subjects, the sieur de Rosne, was, now, the most dangerous. He had received the title of marshal from the duke of Maine, but Henry would not confirm it ; and he had in a manner obliged him to throw himself into the hands of the Spaniards, to whom he did the most important services, in Picardy, and Artois. Henry, after a tedious blockade and siege, reduced la Fere ; but the cardinal archduke, Albert, governor of the Low Countries, had now entered France, with twenty thousand men, and a noble train of artillery. Rosne was, at that time, suspected by the Spaniards, of intending to leave them, and he would have been put to death had he not been saved by Fuentes. While they were debating on his fate, he was informed of his danger, and entering, with an intrepid air, the room where the council of war was sitting, he offered to put them in possession of Calais. The archduke accepted of his proposal, and left to him the direction of the operations. Henry knew of the undertaking when it was too late, and sent over Sancy, to advertise queen Elizabeth of his and her own danger. He opened his commission, and she asked him, whether his master would chuse to see Calais in the hands of the Spaniards or the English ; he honestly answered, in those of the Spaniards. She disdained, after this, to treat with Sancy ; but she sent the lord Sidney, to Henry, to demand Calais, if she should contribute to relieve it. Henry was so provoked with this request, that he turned his back upon Sidney, saying, that he had rather be torn by a lion than

than a lioness. He then attempted to enter the port of Calais with a few troops; but he was driven back by stress of weather, and the place, on the twenty-second of April, was obliged to surrender to the vigorous efforts of Rosne, who in that campaign reduced likewise the important town of Ardres.

Those disgraces hurt the reputation of Henry's arms with He suffers his best friends. It was said that he was attempting in his reputation. to make conquests for the dutchess of Beaufort, when he ought to have secured Picardy, and fortified Calais. He soon felt the effects of this disreputation. The duke of Merceur commanded for the league in Bretagne, and being supported by the Spaniards, he disregarded all offers of accommodation with Henry. In this, he was encouraged by the behaviour of the king's old friends, the hugonots, who had at their head the dukes of Bouillon, and Trimouille. The whole party thought they had been very indifferently treated by Henry; but the situation of his affairs prevented his giving them any relief. Upon this, they took some very disagreeable steps, by raising contributions, and fortifying their towns, at a time, too, when Henry, in Picardy, was destitute even of necessaries. It is to his credit that he incurred those difficulties, by his punctually discharging the vast debts he had contracted, and that his necessities never made him take a dishonourable step. To retrieve his reputation, he sent Biron into Artois, which he ravaged; and Elizabeth, who was now really apprehensive of the power of Spain, renewed all her treaties with him, and soon after sent him over two thousand fresh troops, under Sir Thomas Baskerville. He had the good fortune to find the cardinal de Medici, the pope's legate, to be a moderate, well meaning man, and to discourage all cabals on the part of the Roman catholics.

According to the duke of Sully, who could not be mis- the assembly taken in what he advances, in the year we treat of, nobly of his more than thirty millions of livres came into Henry's nobles at coffer, out of a hundred and fifty millions of the royal Rouen. revenues that were raised upon the people, by his creditors, or their collectors. Thus overwhelmed with difficulties, he took the two most proper steps that wisdom and policy could dictate; for he committed the entire administration of his finances to the duke of Sully, and he convoked an assembly of his nobles, who formed a kind of general estates at Rouen; because the plague was then at Paris. He opened the assembly, by a speech which does him honour, as the father of his people. He told the members, that he had called them together, to put himself entirely into their hands, and that the love he bore for his people rendered every thing possible, and honourable to him. This speech had the desired effect. A new system of policy was introduced; but the protestants, notwithstanding all the king's king's earnest endeavours to mollify them, remained dissatisfied.

His difficulties increase.

While Henry was preparing to reap the fruits of his new arrangements, Portocarrero, the Spanish governor of Dourlens, formed a scheme to surprize Amiens, where the inhabitants had refused, (because they had freely submitted to Henry) to receive his troops. Portocarrero's scheme succeeded, and he took Amiens. Henry's indigent circumstances, at that time, embittered this loss, and he seemed inclined to take some desperate step; when he was presented by Sully with a scheme, by which he raised six hundred thousand crowns by loan, increased his revenue, and drew from his farmers two millions and a half of livres, to prevent their being called to an account. This money could not be raised all at once, and Henry's necessities increased, when the effects of some irregularities obliged him to go to Paris for a cure; it being then free of the plague. There he heard, with the utmost chagrin, that, under the patronage of the queen of England, the dukes of Montpensier, Bouillon, and Trimouille, had formed a party which they called the patriotic; that the affections of the protestants were so alienated from him that they pretended to be under the horrors of a new St. Bartholomew's day; and that the duke of Merccœur was stronger than ever in Bretagne. Even his friend the duke of Florence, had seized upon the fort of If, which commanded the harbour of Marseilles, under pretence of his not being paid the great sums he had advanced to Henry. To say the truth, he performed his pecuniary engagements much more punctually towards his own subjects than towards foreigners. The openness and frankness of Henry's character, his courage, his clemency, and good faith, operated wonderfully in his favour on this occasion.

Loyalty
of the duke of Maine.

The duke of Maine employed not only his interest, but menaces, to keep the Roman catholics quiet. Lefdiguieres, who, without money, had carried on a successful war against the duke of Savoy, threatened to turn his arms against the protestants if they continued longer refractory. The duke of Sully, though a protestant himself, exposed to the hugonots their own madness, and the parliament of Paris refused nothing that Henry could desire; so that the party formed by the three dukes vanished. The money being raised, and more troops arriving from England, Henry at once saw himself at the head of thirty thousand men, with whom he proceeded to the relief of Amiens. He trusted the chief command of his army to the duke of Maine, who well knew the Spanish manner of fighting; but when he came before the place, he found it fortified with additional works, and the archduke in his rear with twenty five thousand veteran troops. By the advice of the duke of Maine, Henry remained in his trenches, on the defensive, and repulsed the Spaniards in several attacks, upon which, the place.

place surrendered on the twentieth of September, and the archduke retired to Arras, which was insulted by Henry.

The success of this glorious campaign re-established not Henry's only the reputation, but the affairs of Henry. Lefdiguieres glorious continued still to be successful against the duke of Savoy, campaign. by whose means, Henry seems to have received the first intimation of Philip's being inclinable to enter into a negotiation for peace. Upon Henry's return to Paris, he punished with death some of the mad remains of the league, who were renewing their intrigues with the king of Spain, and the duke of Mercœur. The latter had intelligence that Philip was, at this time, offering to treat of a peace with England, and it was concluded that it would be impossible for him to maintain his footing in Bretagne. He therefore concluded a truce with the marshal de Brisac, while the secret managements between d'Offat and the Spanish ministers at Rome, where Henry's ambassador, the duke of Luxembourg, was highly carressed, had settled all the preliminaries for opening the conferences.

The few weeks of truce with the duke of Mercœur being He re- over, Henry, who knew that he would not be supported by duces the Spain, opened an early campaign against him in person. duke of The duke's wife was the heiress of the house of Penthievre. Mercœur. It was partly in her right that he had so long held the dutchy of Bretagne, which he flattered himself would remain with him and his heirs; but he now found himself deceived in all his expectations. He neither could prevail with the Spaniards to act, nor prevent some of the chief Breton nobility from delivering up their fortresses to the king; so that his wife, the haughtiest woman alive, was forced to go Angiers, where she threw herself at Henry's feet, and implored that accommodation which her husband had so often proudly rejected. Henry, who never wanted to come to extremes with any of his subjects, was on this occasion influenced by the vast affection he bore for his son, Cæsar, whom he had by the dutchess of Beaufort, and whom he immediately married to the duke of Mercœur's daughter, the heiress of all his vast estate, with such a settlement, as made Cæsar the richest subject in his dominions. The duke was likewise obliged to resign to his son-in-law, his government of Bretagne, and the king raised in that province, during his short stay there, twelve hundred thousand crowns, which the states were enabled to advance him, from the money they received from Spain.

Henry had now scarcely the face of opposition in his own He passes kingdom, and was in a condition to fulfil the promises the edict which he had so often made to the protestants. They re- of Nantes. paired to him at Nantes, where it is said, that Chamier, one of the worthiest of their pastors, presented him with the famous edict which bears the name of that city, ready penned, and which Henry passed, after it had been thoroughly examined. This was the more generous in him, as he had of late experienced more duty and submission in his catholic, than in his protestant, subjects. But he had many wise and important considerations that influenced him to pass the edict of Nantes; because he intended to re-establish his kingdom in tranquility, both at home, and from abroad. This edict was by the protestants very justly considered as a fundamental law of the kingdom. It not only re-established all former edicts in their favour, but granted them a free admission to all places of profit, trust, and dignity. Chambers in which there was an equality of members of both religions were appointed, and the protestants had the privilege of educating their children at the universities, without any concessions to the Roman catholic religion. The parliament of Paris made some difficulty in registering this edict; but Henry's reasons were so cogent, and he enforced them with such plain manly sense, and in a strain of unaffected yet commanding eloquence, that he was obeyed, and even those who had opposed him retracted their opinions, and did justice to his wisdom.

He concludes the peace of Vervins,

But though Henry had succeeded, by his firmness, in thus providing for the internal state and quiet of his kingdom, he found great difficulties in reconciling his allies to the favourite purpose he had now adopted, and which he was resolved to complete. Both queen Elizabeth, and the States General, sent ambassadors to dissuade him from any peace with Spain; to offer their assistance in continuing the war, and to remind him of the strong engagements he lay under to them, to admit of no peace without their participation. Henry gave Cecil, queen Elizabeth's ambassador, a private audience, and admitted the truth of all he said; but pleaded the necessity he was under for what he was doing. Finding that Cecil's discourse bore too hard upon him, he remitted him, and the famous Barneveldt, ambassador from the States General, to an audience of his council, where he himself was present, and heard himself treated, by Cecil, in terms which nothing but his own moderation, and the obligations he lay under to Elizabeth, could have digested. The council followed his example, acknowledged the truth and rectitude of all that the ambassadors urged, but repeated his argument of necessity; and the negotiations went on in such a manner as indicated that they would soon be brought to a conclusion. Elizabeth, who had all Henry's firmness and good sense, but with more acrimony in her temper, justified the behaviour of her ambassador towards him, by a most bitter letter, she wrote, in which she says, that, if there be such a sin as that against the Holy Ghost, it is that of ingratitude.

The conferences at Vervins, which was the place appointed for the treaty, were carried on under the mediation of the pope's legate, and Gonzaga, bishop of Mantua, his nuntio, nuntio. De Bellievre, and Sillery, were plenipotentiaries for Henry; and those for the archduke (for the king of Spain, had none there, on pretence of avoiding disputes concerning precedence) were Richardot, de Taxis, and Verreiken, who produced, under his Catholic majesty's hand, an obligation that he would stand by whatever they should conclude. After some debate, the French plenipotentiaries agreed to admit the duke of Savoy's ambassador, and the Spaniards yielded to those of England and the States General being present at the conferences. Many attempts were made to divide Elizabeth from her connections with the States General; but all to no purpose, and on the second of May, the treaty of Vervins was signed; but a farther time for its publication was reserved, that he might employ his good offices with Elizabeth and the States for their accession. By this treaty, the conquests on both sides (that of Calais included) were to be restored; and the dispute between Henry and the duke of Savoy, concerning the marquisate of Saluces, was to be referred to the arbitration of his holiness; as likewise were, for form sake, many other disputable points between the two crowns of France and Spain. By this treaty, Henry recovered Blaye in Bretagne, Ardres, Montulin, and all that the Spaniards held in Picardy. The duke of Arfeh, and the admiral of Arragon, on the part of the archduke, received Henry's oath for confirming the treaty at Paris; and the marshal Biron, with Bellevre, and Sillery, went to Brussels, where they received the archduke's confirmation in the same manner. About the time the treaty of Vervins was concluded, the great duke of Tuscany, or Florence, by d'Ossat's management, consented to the restitution of the island of If, and all the places he had taken belonging to the crown of France, upon Henry's acknowledgment of the debt he owed him; and, in compliment to his person, he even remitted the stipulation of twelve hostages, whom Henry was to send him for the payment of the money.

The treaty of Vervins was more glorious as well as advantageous to France, than any she had concluded since the Henry's days of Philip Augustus; and left Henry at liberty to execute the vast schemes he had formed for the good of his people. In this he was assisted by the ministry of the great Sully, who replenished his finances without oppressing his subjects. Henry, on his part, did all that could be expected from the father of his country, which he had raised from greater distress than it had ever experienced from the power of the English. He disbanded all his useless troops; he retrenched all his unnecessary expences; he attended to Sully, who laid before him a clear and consistent, but magnificent, scheme of œconomy; he remitted twenty millions in taxes, that either were oppressive, or impracticable to be raised; he gave to commerce and the arts lustre and dignity; he re-established the manufactures of gold and silver stuffs, which had been prohibited hibited by sumptuary laws, and which have been since of immense value to France; he encouraged the weaving of rich tapestry; he dug canals, and built a-croſs the Seine the noble bridge which ſtill bears his name. He embellished, enlarged, and improved his capital, and all the royal palaces, in ſuch a manner, that the Spaniſh ambaffador, upon his return to France, did not know where he was; and he completed all thoſe and many other noble deſigns, while he was every day paying off his debts, and without diminifhing either the luſtre, or the gaiety of his court. We have, in this place, exhibited the peaceful glories of the ſucceeding part of Henry's reign, that we may be under no neceſſity of interrupting the narrative of his civil and military tranſactions.

Death of Philip II.

and of the dutch-eſs of Beaufort.

Soon after the peace of Vervins was concluded, Philip II. died, and Henry recovered from a dangerous fever. He married his ſiſter to the duke of Bar, though ſhe was a proteſtant, and he a Roman catholic. His popiſh clergy, with ſome reaſon, remonſtrated to him, that the dignity of his crown was violated by one of the articles of the edict of Nantes; which had been inſerted to ſaſtify the duke of Bouillon, “permitting foreigners, without the royal leave, to aſſiſt at the proteſtant ſynods.” Henry modified this article. But while he acted thus ſo greatly in his royal character, he ſunk to meannefs in his private. His paſſion for the dutcheſs of Beaufort was now ſo violent, that he ſollicited a divorce at the court of Rome from his wife Margaret, that he might marry his miſtreſs. While he was proſecuting this infane and ſcandalous ſcheme, the dutcheſs died, and Henry (ſo quick were the viciffitudes of his paſſions) ſoon forgot her, and in three weeks he filled her place with madame d'Entragues. Henry was ſo little maſter of himſelf, that he made this lady a promiſe of marriage under his hand, and ſhewed it to Sully; who tore it, without regard to his maſter's diſpleaſure. Henry replaced it, by a freſh promiſe; and while Sully thought himſelf diſgraced he gave him the maſterſhip of the ordnance, in addition to his other great employments. Queen Margaret, before the death of the dutcheſs of Beaufort, had oppoſed her divorce, becauſe the king's reſolution to marry that lady was publicly known; but upon her death, ſhe conſented to the divorce, as having been forced by her brother to marry him; and the pope pronounced the ſentence. Henry's miniſters, to prevent his running into a ſcandalous match, contracted him, though not without his knowledge, yet contrary to his expectation, to Mary de Medici, the neice of his friend the great duke of Tuſcany. He diſliked the match, but he married the lady. We have already mentioned that the pope, by the treaty of Vervins, was rendered arbiter of the differences between Henry and the duke of Savoy, concerning the marquiſate of Saluces. Henry's open, frank manner, gave that duke a contempt contempt of his understanding, and he resolved to visit the French court, in hopes that, either by his address, he would over-reach Henry, or by his intrigues, embroil him with his great subjects.

The patience, and perseverance of Henry, under the provocations he met with, form, perhaps, the most amiable part of his character. His great lords, before the peace of Uervins was concluded, had scarcely known a superior, and, at this time, they were so fond of the prerogative of independency, that Henry, though it did violence to his nature, was sometimes obliged to let them know that they were subject to him and the laws of their country. He had very justly reprimanded the duke of Bouillon, who owed him all he possessed, for endeavouring to strengthen himself, by foreign or factious alliances, against the royal authority. Though he had pardoned the duke of Epernon, yet he could not reduce him to the rank of a dutiful subject; for he was perpetually over-rating his power and his merits. The dukes of Montmorenci, Trimouille, Montpensier, and Biron, had all of them capital objections to their subordinate stations, and at times, even insulted their sovereign. The duke of Savoy had intelligence of their discontents, and when he came to the French court, where he lived in a manner equally elegant and splendid, he endeavoured to improve them; and it is certain that he made some impression upon the marshal duke of Biron, whose head was already turned with vanity and insolence. Henry's firmness defeated him of his other expectations. He told the duke, that he absolutely expected the marquisate of Saluces, or an equivalent. The duke promised the latter, and Henry honourably suffered him to return to his dominions without detaining him as a pledge for the restitution of the marquisate, which had been most iniquitously taken from France. Upon his return to Turin, and finding that Henry was proof to all his arts and refinements, he applied to Philip III. for protection and assistance, against the execution of the treaty he had concluded, obliging him to restore to Henry the marquisate, or an equivalent. Henry was not to be amused, and though the court of Spain promised to support the duke, he attacked him in three different parts of his dominions, the greatest part of which he reduced in one campaign. It is to the glory of Henry, that we mention his having, during that campaign, re-established the liberties of Geneva, which the duke of Savoy was upon the point of crushing, by means of fort St. Catharine, which he had built to bridle that city.

Though Henry met with many embarrassments from his great lords, no prince was ever better served than he was by ministers. Upon the death of Chiverny, he had given the seals of the chancellorship to Pompone de Bellievre, a man of equal abilities and probity. Sillery managed his affairs at Rome with incomparable address. The president Jeannin, conducted the internal affairs of government with great capacity, and a moderation that was entirely agreeable to Henry's disposition; and the name of the duke of Sully, is, to this day, but another appellation for a faithful minister, an able financier, and a sincere friend to the person of his prince. Such was the state of Henry's government, when he finished his campaign in Savoy, and married his bride at Lyons, to which city she was conducted, with all the pomp and magnificence that France and Italy could exhibit. The duke of Savoy, by this time, perceiving that he was in danger of being stript of all his dominions, had recourse to the mediation of the pope. He had been the dupe of his own refinements. The duke of Sully, a name by which he is better known than that of marquis of Rosni, not only advised, but conducted, the war, in his capacity of master of the ordinance. It was owing to him, that many places which the duke of Savoy had deemed to be impregnable, were almost instantly taken; and Henry, by his councils, about the time of his second marriage, shewed himself to be well disposed towards a treaty with the same prince, whom he had, in a manner, at his mercy. A treaty was, accordingly, concluded between Henry, and him, upon the terms that the former was pleased to prescribe.

His nar-
capes.

Though Henry was, in the eye world, thus fortunate and victorious, yet no prince in his time escaped so many attempts, as he did, of assassination and poison. Three monks had been executed for plotting against his life; and when he entered upon the war with Savoy, a woman had been burnt alive for undertaking to poison him. Though the duke of Biron had served him nobly in the field, through the vanity of conquest, yet the duke of Savoy had found means to flatter his foibles so effectually, that he secretly brought him over to his interest. Henry was above all suspicion, and continued to employ him, both as a general, and an ambassador, and was never tired of loading him with favours, though Biron requited them with insolence and ingratitude. He employed the duke of Sully to come at the real sentiments of that great princess queen Elizabeth, with regard to the affairs of the Low Countries; which the duke effected, by pretending to make a tour to England, merely through curiosity.

He
marches
to Picardy.

The siege of Ostend had, about this time, been undertaken by the archduke Albert; and the following incident which happened at Valladolid, had embroiled Henry with the court of Spain. His ambassador, the count de la Roche-pot, had killed, upon the stage, a Spanish actor, who played the character of an officer, with his foot upon the neck of Francis I. and Henry, not satisfied with the punishment of the actor, had demanded farther satisfaction, in so peremptory a manner, that it interested his holiness in the dispute; dispute, as a mediator. Henry would not, perhaps, have prosecuted this affair so warmly, had he not perceived that the count de Fuentes, and the archduke Albert, had been intriguing with his subjects for surprizing Marseilles, and Metz; and he thought himself so highly concerned in the event of the siege of Ostend, that he went in person to Calais, and surveyed the state of his fortifications towards the Low Countries. Queen Elizabeth was, then, at Dover, and she sent over Sir Thomas Edmonds, not only to compliment Henry, but to desire an interview with him upon the sea, offering to meet him half way; but he declined the invitation, on pretence that her majesty's health might suffer. The truth is, Henry distrusted Elizabeth, and had some apprehension that she might carry him a prisoner to England, in order to be paid the great sums he owed her, and to oblige him to give up Calais; a measure which she had always at heart. Add to this, that Henry, who was naturally an œconomist, did not chuse to vie with the magnificence of the English court.

He broke, however, into his usual frugal maxims on this occasion, for he sent over marshal Biron with a train of two hundred noblemen and gentlemen, the whole of his retinue exceeding four hundred, to return his compliments to Elizabeth.

We are now arrived at the most difficult and impenetrable part of Henry's history. We have already mentioned the character of the marshal duke of Biron. Elizabeth found out his weak side, and predicted that his fate would be the same with that of the earl of Essex, whom she had beheaded some time before Biron's arrival in England. During Henry's campaign in Savoy, Biron had received many applications, both from that duke, and the court of Spain, with promises, even to the extent of his ambition, if he would betray the French army, and assist in dethroning Henry. Biron, upon reflection, presumptuous as he was, trembled at the thoughts of such engagements, confessed to Henry the offers that had been made him, and asked his pardon for not having sooner discovered them. It is uncertain what motive determined the king to trust him after this acknowledgement; for he seemed to do it in a more unreserved manner than before. The king very probably was afraid of him; for when he sent him to England, he planted many spies about his person, and the first intelligence of Biron's treasons seems to have been communicated from thence to Henry. Whatever may be in this, it is certain, that Winwood, Elizabeth's resident at Paris, was again entrusted by the duke of Sully with every step of the discoveries which either he or his master made, relating to his intrigues with Spain and Savoy. They found that Biron, about the time of his English embassy, had not only renewed his intrigues both with those two powers, but had entered into a treasonable association with the duke of Bouillon, and the count of Auvergne, who had accompanied him to England, to stand by each other. This gave a sensible alarm to Henry, who had about him a kind of political timidity, with regard to the protestants; but could trust his subjects with his resentments against Spain and Savoy. He suffered, on that account, Biron to proceed in his practices, and even gave him thirty thousand crowns for his services in the wars of Savoy, and employed him in renewing his alliance with the Swiss cantons; upon the birth of a dauphin, which happened about this time, and filled all France with extasies of joy.

Birth of a Dauphin. An heir to the crown strengthened the throne of Henry against all intrigues, foreign, and domestic. He instituted a court of enquiry into the mismanagements of his revenue, and received a magnificent embassy from the Othman emperor, who complained that the duke of Mercoeur was the Austrian general against him; but Henry evaded giving him any satisfaction on that head, because that duke was a vassal to the German empire as well as to France. By this time, marshal Biron had, with a most amazing address, concluded a very advantageous treaty for his master with the Swiss cantons, which confirmed Henry in his opinion, that, whatever dangerous appearances his conduct wore, he was faithful in his heart, and that he would ever remain so, by keeping him employed.

Henry's weaknesses Henry was now at the period of his life and reign which shewed him to be much more capable of encountering adversity, than improving prosperity. Every little weakness of his disposition now appeared, and was magnified beyond its real extent. His frugality, though necessary for discharging his vast debts, was construed into avarice and ingratitude to his best friends. His taxes, however necessary, were termed oppressive, and he was obliged to move to Blois, Poitiers, and other places, to suppress the insurrections they created. The public discontents were fomented by the agents of Spain, and Savoy, and even by the Italian attendants of his queen; so that Henry was in a more perplexed situation than he was when fighting for his life and kingdom. La Fin was Biron's agent, and the duke of Sully made him sensible that he was no stranger to the marshal's practices; upon which, la Fin, to save himself, put into Henry's hands the treasonable association we have already mentioned. Henry, on this occasion, shewed that he could dissemble as exquisitely as any of his most secret enemies, found that it was necessary for him to take off Biron's head. It is, however, not to be denied, that his unsteady, mean conduct in his amours, had given the public a contemptible idea of his person and morals, which had extended itself to every branch of his government.

While

While he was at Poitiers, he had such proofs of the reality of his danger from Biron, that he hurried to Fontainebleau, from whence he sent advices to queen Elizabeth, charging the duke of Bouillon, whom he knew she favoured, with treason. As he was afraid of proceeding capitally against that duke, he desired him to remain about his person; but he first escaped to Chartres, and from thence to Geneva, the whole body of French hugonots making his cause their own.

Henry was far from being displeased at the duke's escape, as it carried with it the appearance of a consciousness of guilt; but the duke of Epernon quieted all his suspicions, by not only offering to remain about his person for six months, but to give up his sons as hostages for his future behaviour.

The only measure Henry was now to take was to decoy Biron, who was at his government of Burgundy, into his power. For that purpose he threw out several kind expressions, in the hearing of those whom he knew to be the marshal's friends, and even accomplices; which when reported to him, determined him to go to court, where he arrived on the thirteenth of June, the king being then at Fontainebleau. The king, on this occasion, behaved with unparalleled generosity. He employed the duke of Epernon, and Biron's other friends, to let him know that he was safe, if he made an ingenuous confession of his guilt; but Biron answered all applications of that kind, by laying his hand on his sword, and threatening destruction to his enemies. The king talked to him with his usual affability and openness; and made him sensible that he was no stranger to his practices; upon which both he, and the count of Auvergne, had concerted their escape, but were prevented by their being arrested the very day they were to have put it into execution. Biron was tried by a commission of the parliament, before whom he appeared with a degree of insanity. Finding that all his arts did not avail him, when, on the twenty-seventh of July, he appeared before all the chambers of the parliament assembled, the peers not chusing to assist at the trial; he made so moving and so manly a defence, that the members were dissolved in tears; and it was thought, that had the vote been immediately put, he must have been acquitted. But the king had gone too far to suffer him to escape; and two days after, he was condemned to death; which he suffered with a pusillanimity and confusion, that amazed the spectators, as he had always shewn himself, in the greatest dangers, intrepid to a degree of insensibility. Such was the end of the hero of whom the king used to say, "This is the man whom I present to my friends, and to my enemies."

The duke
of Biron

Biron's death was attended with vast discoveries. The Confe-baron de Fontenelle, one of his accomplices, was broken quences of alive upon the wheel. The baron de Lux, his confident, the same.
made

made such important discoveries, that the king found it proper to conceal them, because he thought the parties affected were too great to be brought to justice. The count of Auvergne was pardoned at the intercession of his sister madam d'Esstragues, and the king pretended that he paid that compliment to the only living male representative of the house of Valois, the count being the natural son of Charles IX. The French historians have scandalously concealed the important services of queen Elizabeth, when Biron's conspiracy was discovered; for it certainly was owing to her moderation, that the duke of Bouillon, and all the hugonots in France, did not then take arms; in which they would have been supported by Spain and Savoy.

Henry is congratulated.

It was with horror the king looked back on the dangers he had escaped; for it appeared, from the papers laid before him, that there scarcely was a great man in his court or kingdom, uncorrupted by foreign gold or promises. Even Sully had been named among the discontented; but by that we are only to understand, the free open manner in which he taxed his master's weaknesses with regard to women. The principal powers of Europe congratulated the king upon his escape from this conspiracy; and the king of Spain, with the duke of Savoy, among others, sent him their ambassadors, with compliments; but they were disregarded. To prevent a return of the like dangers, the king nominated the dauphin to the government of Burgundy, and the duke de Bellegrade to be his lieutenant. In the autumn of the year 1602, forty-two deputies from the Swiss cantons and the Grisons appeared at Paris, and renewed their league with Henry, who confirmed them in all their privileges; but refused to augment the annual subsidies they received from his crown, which amounted to four hundred thousand crowns.

Though the king had some mistaken notions with regard to personal courage, that gave too much countenance to the barbarous custom of duelling; yet there was now an absolute necessity for checking it, as four thousand of his subjects had been killed during one year, in single combats. An edict therefore was published, declaring duelling to be high treason, and that all quarrels of honour should be determined by the constable and marshals of France. In that same year Henry again supported the people of Geneva against the duke of Savoy, and the king of Spain, and procured them such a peace as has ever since preserved their liberties. In a journey he made to Metz, he relieved the inhabitants from the oppressions of two of the duke of Epernon's, the governor's, lieutenants; and he had several conferences with the German princes, or their deputies, concerning the favourite measure of his reign; the reduction of the Austrian power.

Notwith-

Notwithstanding all that has been said of Henry's religion, His alliance it is to this day uncertain whether he was not a thorough and sincere convert to the church of Rome, and whether he king did not remain so to the time of his death, whatever the political motives of his conversion might originally have been. James. It is certain that, after his establishment on the throne, and after he came to have a good understanding with the see of Rome, he found himself more at ease with his Roman catholic, than his protestant, subjects, who were perpetually upbraiding him with the obligations he owed them; and, even after the publication of the edict of Nantes, demanded privileges that he could not grant them consistently with the duty he owed to his own dignity and safety. His weakness, however, in readmitting, as he did, at this time, the jesuits into his dominions, is inexcusable; especially as it was against the sense even of his Roman catholic subjects. The best apology that can be made for Henry, on the head of religion, is, that he found it would be dangerous for him to act otherwise than he did.

He was greatly afflicted with the news of queen Elizabeth's death; and, as soon as he recovered from a dangerous indisposition with which he was seized about the same time, he sent over the duke of Sully to manage his concerns with her successor king James, with whom he was not upon very good terms. The great plan of Sully's negotiation was to prevent any connections being formed between James and the house of Austria; and, to flatter James, Sully was instructed to hint to him, that he might, if he pleased, render himself the head and protector of the protestant party in Europe.

The count of Aremberg was then at the English court on the part of the archduke, and had actually laid before James proposals for a treaty; which Barneveldt, the ambassador from the States-general, endeavoured all he could to traverse. Sir Robert Cecil was the English secretary of state, and, in political abilities, perhaps, not inferior to Sully; but he was warped by a partiality for Spain. Barneveldt made Sully sensible of this, and the latter refused to treat with any but James himself; with whom he managed so artfully, that James checked Cecil for being an enemy to France; and a treaty was actually concluded at Hampton-court, offensive and defensive, between the two crowns; who agreed, at the same time, to support the States-general against the crown of Spain and the archduke.

Sully, upon his return to France, was censured for his Conduct in this treaty; but he had taken the precaution to obtain his instructions from Henry, under his own hand; and that king, by procuring the name of antichrist, which stood in the protestant confession of faith for the pope, to be struck out, and restoring the jesuits to France, soon made his peace with the court of Rome.

It

It was about this time that Henry projected the settlement of the province of Canada, which was strongly opposed by his minister, Sully; who foretold, that it would prove no other than a drain to the population and riches of the nation. Whether the king or his minister were in the right, may be justly questioned; but, in our opinion, that settlement was of much greater detriment than advantage to France; which was owing to two reasons. The first is, that the French were void of the true principles and spirit of colonization: the next is, that the colony itself proved no other than a province of the jesuits. Their interest at court prevented the colonists from taking any advantage of their settlement; nor did the benefit which the crown drew from it ever answer the expence of the plantation.

Discovery of new treasons.

The death of the king's sister, the dutchess of Bar, who was a sincere protestant, was a fresh matter of affliction to Henry; whose ambassador at Madrid, at this time, discovered that all his secrets were betrayed to the Spanish ministry by one Hote, an under secretary to Monsieur de Villeroy, the principal secretary of state. The court of Spain suspected the discovery, and put Hote upon his guard; but he is said to have been drowned in endeavouring to make his escape. This affair is still dark. Sully thought that Villeroy himself was in the secret; but he vindicated himself in public, in a printed apology; and Henry seems to have believed him, by restoring to him his friendship and place at the council-board. Whatever may have been in this, the Spaniards no sooner made a peace with Great Britain, than they imposed a tax of thirty per cent. upon all French goods; which amounted to a prohibition of them. Henry, upon that, forbade all commerce with Spain. The difference was adjusted by the pope, and the prohibitions, on both sides, were withdrawn.

Sully's great services.

It was fortunate for Henry that such a man as the duke of Sully was his first minister, and a protestant at the same time. The dukes of Bouillon and Trimouille encouraged the factious spirit of the hugonots; and Henry was obliged to counterballance their credit, by giving the government of Poitou to Sully, who soon put a stop to their cabals. On the other hand, Henry's marriage proved to him a continual source of disquiet. He was too generous in his nature to treat his queen ill, notwithstanding the vast provocations she gave him from her wayward, peevish, jealous disposition; and yet he found it dangerous to indulge her with any degree of confidence, because he knew that she was weak enough to discover all his secrets to her hungry Italian dependents, who sold them to the court of Spain. Henry had often threatened to dismiss them; but he was as often intimidated by the court of Rome, whose friendship he found actually necessary for his quiet; and even D'Ossat, his great negotiator there, was suspected of being too violent a churchman, and of endeavouring to revive in Henry the persecuting spirit of the Valois family.

The vexations, however, which he received from his Henry's queen, were far more tolerable than the insolence of his distresses, mistress d'Entragues, whom he had created marchioness de who parts Verneuil, and who treated him with an equal degree of rude- with his nefs and ridicule. Her arrogance, at last, became so insup- mistress. portable, that Henry gave her twenty thousand crowns for the promise of marriage he had signed with her; and consented to make her father, d'Entragues, a marshal of France; upon which, she retired to a private life.

It was not long before it was discovered, that she and her Her fami- brother, the count d'Auvergne, and all her family, were ly's con- known to be engaged in the most dangerous practices against spiracy the king and his state. The count, under pretence of be- and pu- ing a spy upon the court of Spain, had betrayed to that mi- nishment. nistry all Henry's secrets that had been communicated to him by his sister. He was, with some difficulty, made prisoner; and sent to the room which Biron had possessed in the bastile. Old d'Entragues, and one Morgan, an Englishman, were found to be concerned in the treason; and Henry ordered the process of all the parties to be made out before the parliament, seemingly with an intention that they should experience the rigour of justice. The proofs were plain against them; the count d'Auvergne, old d'Entragues, and Morgan, were condemned to lose their heads; and the marchioness de Verneuil to be shut up in a convent. None of those sentences were executed. Some doubts were suggested by the Spanish faction at Rome, whether their crimes amounted to high-treason. The count d'Auvergne was condemned to imprisonment for life; the marchioness and her father to reside upon their own estates; and Morgan was banished France.

Henry continued to meet with equal, if not more severe, He is em, vexations from the quarter of protestantism. The heads of broiled his hugonot subjects, besides the dukes of Bouillon and Tri- with the mouille, were Lefdiguieres, du Plessis Mornay, and Aubigni. protest- They thought that they were not sufficiently secured in the ants. possession of their privileges; and they pretended to foresee what afterwards happened, that a bigotted prince, upon the throne of France, might revoke the edict of Nantes; upon which they had recourse to their old scheme of an association. The king obtained a copy of it, and the duke of Sully was ordered to assist in their synod at Chatelleraud; where he exposed the dangerous and treasonable nature of their proceedings so effectually, that they were ashamed of the scheme, and it was dropped by the more understanding part of the assembly. It unaccountably happened, that even the bigotted court of Spain was always ready to support the French hugonots in the uneasiness they gave to Henry, who no longer hesitated to proceed against the duke of Bouillon with firmness and severity.

Henry's first wife, Margaret of Valois, was still alive, and proved to be one of the most loyal of his subjects. She had found out some intrigues among the hugonots of Perigord, Guienne, and other places; which she laid before the king; and he rewarded her not only with a great part of the count d'Auvergne's forfeited estate, but with a licence to live at Paris. Some of the protestant conspirators, who were found to be connected with the Spaniards, were executed upon her discoveries; and Henry put himself at the head of an army to reduce the estates and places belonging to the duke of Bouillon, and those of his other subjects, who were engaged in dangerous practices with the Spaniards. The duke was in no condition to resist him. He ordered his governors to lay the keys of their towns at Henry's feet; and even the Rochellers, jealous as they were of their privileges, surprized the king by a deputation, inviting him to their city; and offered to beat down their gates if they were not sufficiently wide for his reception. Henry was pleased with the compliment, accepted the invitation, and left Rochelle with a high opinion of the politeness and loyalty of its inhabitants.

The punishment of the conspirators in other parts of France was, all this while, going on. It was discovered that two brothers, who were gentlemen of some figure in Provence, had offered to sell Narbonne to the Spaniards; for which they lost their heads; as did Mariarques, a person of great eminence in Marscilles, for offering to betray that city to the catholic king. Towards the latter end of the year 1605, Henry narrowly escaped being assassinated by one John Lisle, who proving to be a lunatic, was punished only by being shut up in a mad-house.

The duke of Bouillon's submissions were far from removing Henry's apprehensions, and he took the spirited resolution to lay hold of Sedan itself. The duke of Sully, as master of the ordnance, was ordered to prepare a train of artillery for the expedition. The duke thought he had a powerful support in the German princes, the Swiss cantons, and the Spanish faction about the court; but they all failed him; and, upon Henry's advancing against Sedan, he threw himself upon the king's mercy, who pardoned him for all offences against his person and government; while the other consented that the king should garrison Sedan for four years; but he knew so well how to work upon Henry's generosity and openness, that the latter withdrew his garrison in a month's time; and, when the duke waited upon him at Paris, he received him into his favour.

The king, after this, ventured upon several vigorous measures, which he durst not complete before. He erected a new chamber for calling the financiers, those leeches of his people, to account; and he obliged them to disgorge six hundred thousand crowns of their ill-got gains. Upon the birth of his second son, the duke of Orleans, he rendered himself more independent than he was before upon the princes of his blood. The chief of these were, the prince of Conde, who would have succeeded Henry, had he died without male issue, the prince of Conti, and the count of Soissons, his brother; but none of them were of abilities sufficient to acquire popularity. About this time, his former queen, Margaret, recovered great estates in her own right, before the parliaments of Tholouse and Paris; but she converted their revenues into a pension, and conveyed the lands to the dauphin. When Henry was thus just beginning to taste felicity as a king, he and his queen, with the dukes of Vendosme, and Montpensier, with the princess of Conti, in their return from St. Germain, were in the most imminent danger of being drowned, by the king's horses falling into the water, and pulling the coach after them. The king was saved by swimming, and the sieur de Chasteneraye, dragged the queen out by the hair of her head.

All the excellent qualities of the king could not defend Henry's him from a kind of personal contempt which his subjects growing contracted for him, on account of his growing weakness weakness for women. He relapsed into his former fondness for the for women marchioness de Verneuil, and he conferred the title of countess de Moret, upon a new mistress. The necessities he had encountered during his youth, and the payment of the vast debts he had contracted, made him too sensible of the value of money, which he was daily accumulating. In this he was not a little encouraged by the duke of Sully, who was blamed for winking too much at the oppressions of the people by the under farmers, that he might squeeze money out of them, which did not go back to the injured subject, but went into the king's coffers. This failing in Henry's government gave a vast advantage to Sillery, the keeper of the seals, and to secretary Villeroy; both of them enemies to Sully, who had no protection, but the private opinion the king had of his honesty and abilities. These rendered him one of the most useful ministers any king ever had. They maintained his credit among the protestants, who, in general, thought him too moderate; but his candour and strength of reasoning were such, that he always carried through the king's measures in their assemblies at Rochelle.

Henry, in his government, seems to have proposed his great He imicoteremporary queen Elizabeth, as his model. His council- tatesqueen board, as already hinted, was composed of different parties, Elizabeth. and all of them had freedom of debate. The conduct of the protestants, who expected from him greater favours than he could

could grant them; had soured him too much, and gave vast advantages to the Spanish and popish party. According to the French authors, who are not discountenanced by others, he had some view of bringing the Dutch, who, in 1607, were in great distress, to implore his protection. Barneveldt, and the Dutch patriots, suspected this; and took measures for disappointing it; for they treated with the archduke, as a free state, and united themselves at the same time to the king of England. Henry finding his scheme not practicable, sent the president Jednnin, to assist his resident Buzenval, at the Hague, in forming a definitive treaty between himself, and the States General, as a sovereign power. The French ministers acquitted themselves to admiration. By this treaty, Henry engaged to lend the states ten thousand men, if they were attacked, and the states were to lend him five thousand men in the like exigency, either by sea or land. This was a wise measure, as it rendered the dominions of the states a barrier to those of Henry against the power of Spain, in the Low Countries.

His public spirit.

The king often differed with his great minister, Sully, in matters of internal policy. His views were now more enlarged than those of Sully, who had too contracted notions of national improvements, that were attended by expence. The king thought no expence too great that could promote them. Besides the introduction of silk worms, he laid out large sums on the encouragement of tapestry weaving, and the linnen manufacture; two branches of trade that have been since of immense profit to France. The king's public spirit in this was the more remarkable, as the bounties were originally given to foreigners; nor did the returns immediately accrue to his coffers. While he was thus intent on his domestic affairs, he did not forget his patrimonial estates, which, all but those which lay in Bearn, he united to the crown of France. The birth of a third son, who had the title of duke of Anjou, was an additional felicity to Henry's government, and the court of Spain, now aimed at very near connections with him; in which they were but too much encouraged by their party in the cabinet. Don Pedro de Toledo, one of the ministers of Philip III. proposed to Henry a double match, between the dauphin and his daughter, and between his eldest son and Henry's daughter, as a prelude to a catholic league for overawing the French hugonots; and in the end, all the protestants in Europe. Henry gave no encouragement for those propositions; and his disquietude, while the Spaniard remained at Paris, was visible to all about him. Even his subjects remembered so much of the Spanish practices, that during his abode there, the public was entertained with little but plots, conspiracies, and attempts against the king's life, by steel, poison, or magic, and the ridiculous accusation accusation of the latter brought some innocent, but busy, people to the scaffold.

Henry's deliverance from his apprehensions of Spain was and pr far from contributing to his private felicity. The queen vate un- was continually intriguing against his quiet, on account of happiness. the marchioness of Verneuil regaining her ascendancy in his affections. His distrust of the protestants encreased every day; and made him reject a project for receiving into his dominions six hundred thousand Spanish Moors, who offered to become his subjects, and to improve the lands of France. Henry, in this impolitic refusal, was not a little influenced by the court of Rome; and, towards the latter part of his reign, his jealousy of the protestants encreased. Though he loved and esteemed Sully, he could not bear the thought of his continuing to be a protestant; and he offered to give his son, the marquis of Rosni, his natural daughter, in marriage, with vast sums in money and estates, together with the reversion of the constable's sword, upon the death of Montmorenci, to the duke himself, provided he and his son would turn Roman catholics. That wise minister declined this offer, and demonstrated to his master that he could serve him much more effectually by remaining a protestant.

We have already related the differences between the re- Vol. X. public of Venice and pope Paul II. which were compromif- p. 307, ed by Henry, whom the pope now considered as the only 308. friend he had amongst the European princes; and in fact,

Henry thereby prevented the Venetians from throwing off the papal yoke. He was now at the time of life that requires ease and security; but both were interrupted by his own restless passion. He brought about a marriage between the prince of Conde, who had been betrothed to the duke of Maine's daughter, and the daughter of the constable Montmorenci, who was to have married Bassompierre.

Henry's view in this was, that he might indulge a violent His passion passion that he had conceived for the young princess, whose for the husband he thought would be tractable on that head. This princess of dotage, however he endeavoured to conceal it, encreased Conde, his domestic disquiets, which were augmented by the jealousy entertained by the States General of his power; and Vol. IX. which we have elsewhere treated of. P. 343.

Henry's minister, Jeannin, conquered all the opposition Account he met with in the Low Countries; and if we are to believe of his the hints thrown out by the duke of Sully, and the other great historians of the time, Jeannin had orders to agree, on any scheme, terms, to a truce between the archduke and the states, that Henry might be at liberty to turn his thoughts to the most important concern of his life, that of humbling the house of Austria. Henry durst not disoblige the pope, and the catholic party in his council, of which the queen was the head, was perpetually exciting him to severity against the protestants, which must have been equally dangerous to his repose. He saw, that not only the tranquility of his kingdom, but the legitimacy of his children, depended on his continuing to acknowledge the papal power, while at the same time he was firmly convinced that his safety depended on humbling its two chief supports, the German, and the Spanish, branches of the house of Austria. He proposed to do this by restoring the Hungarians, and Bohemians, to their liberties, and by protecting the German princes in their opposition to the emperor; as well as by circumscribing the power of Spain in the Low Countries, and on the side of Savoy. It was with this view, if we are to believe the same authorities, that Henry had amassed his vast treasures, and endeavoured to unite all his subjects in his great design.

The death of the duke of Cleves, without issue, gave Henry a plausible opportunity for putting the mighty machine in motion. The duke of Sully, however, on this occasion, enters upon some very extraordinary discussions, which we shall just mention in general; for indeed they are too chimerical to be particularized. He tells us, that Henry had conceived an idea that it was possible to form the powers of Europe into a kind of republic, (a notion which possibly might then have been suggested to him from the constitution of antient Greece); by which means not only the power of Austria might be limited, but the Ottoman empire overthrown. This republic was to have been formed by a new partition of power among the European potentates, of whom France was to have been the head; but without any other advantage accruing to her, than the glory of having planned so noble a system. We need not detain our reader with any observation on the impracticability of this scheme, however plausible it was.

It was the fate of Henry to suffer the most abject meanesses to mingle with his most elevated purposes. The romantic project already mentioned, is not so incredible as that the prodigious armaments he had on foot, were put in motion by the inordinate, but ridiculous passion, he continued to entertain for the princess of Conde, and which was now so notorious, that it effected a kind of a reconciliation between the queen and the marchioness of Verneuil. The prince had carried his wife into Picardy; and the king was discovered in attempting to visit her in disguise. The prince soon after came to court, and the king, in violation of all decency, ordered that his princess should attend him. The prince pretended to comply; but on the last of November, carried her to Landreci, which belonged to the archduke. The king's uneasiness at this event was despicable and inconceivable. He sent Praslin, the captain of his guards, with such menaces to the archduke Albert, as would have intimidated intimidated him from giving his protection to the illustrious pair, had he not been reassured by Spinola, who persuaded him to invite them to Brussels. This drove the king into all the fury and vexation of a capricious tyrant. The effects of a formal declaration of war would have been too slow for his purpose, and the marquis Cœuvres, the prince of Conde's confident, was sent to carry off the princess, if he failed in persuading him to return, under pretext of putting her into the hands of madam de Angoulesme, who had brought her up. The king unguardedly discovered this scheme, which he imagined could not fail, to his queen, who found means to put the marquis of Spinola upon his guard; and, a few hours before the plot was to have been executed, the archdutchess, at his request, secured her in his own palace. The king sunk into childishness at the disappointment; and the public imagined that the double dispatch which was now employed in his military preparations, was with a view to his recovering possession of the princess.

We shall not amuse the reader, instead of informing him, He raises about all the preparatory steps said to have been taken by a great the king for the accomplishment of his favourite league. army. Some of the facts are not sufficiently authenticated; others are too chimerical for belief, and a cloud of uncertainty hangs over the whole. The king's vast armaments, however, can admit of no doubt. His army consisted of forty thousand excellent troops, commanded by veteran officers, under himself, who was now the most experienced general in Europe. Besides these, the king had taken a large body of Swiss into his pay, and was to have been joined by a great number of volunteers raised among the noblemen and gentlemen of France; and he had already ordered a large body of troops to defile towards Juliers, to support the princes of the league in opposing archduke Leopold's commission, by virtue of which he had seized, in the emperor's name, that dutchy, and that of Cleves. The siege of Juliers, by this time, had been resolved upon by the protestant princes, while the courts of Madrid and Brussels remained unconcerned spectators. Archduke Albert durst not refuse Henry a passage through his dominions against Juliers; but Henry, all this time, remained at Paris, in a most distracted state of mind. The prince of Conde had escaped from Germany, and from thence to Milan, where the conde de Fuentes, the Spanish governor, by his court's order, gave out that the children whom Henry had by Mary of Medici, being illegitimate, the prince was to be considered as next heir to the crown of France. This did not give Henry so much concern as a certain inward dread, which, according to the duke of Sully, hung at this time upon his spirits, of meeting an untimely end, and that too in a coach. Notwithstanding that, Henry concerted with the duke of Sully, and his other ministers, a plan for carrying his great scheme into execution ; but all Europe was amazed on hearing that his grand army, preceded by fifty pieces of brass cannon, the greatest train of artillery that ever had been known, was to march through Luxembourg, against so contemptible an enemy as archduke Leopold, and so poorly fortified a town as Juliers ; which the protestant league was able to have reduced.

His queen crowned, and presages of his death. The means taken by the king for securing the tranquility of his kingdom, during his absence, were proportioned to the supposed importance of his expedition, and the governor of every province was assigned a council to assist him, while Sully assured the king, that he might command forty millions in ready money. Before his departure, the queen, influenced, perhaps, by the reports of the Spaniards, concerning her childrens illegitimacy, expressed a violent desire to be crowned. The duke of Sully knew the parade and expence of such a ceremony to be disagreeable to the king, and would have opposed it ; but the queen prevailed, and she was crowned on the thirteenth of May, at Senlis, by the cardinal de Joyeuse. Every circumstance relating to the fate of so great a prince as Henry IV. is thought to be of importance ; but those preceding his death were so various, and some of them so unaccountable, that we cannot insert them without transgressing our proposed bounds. The chief is, that Henry was heard to say, softly, “ My God, what is this within me, that will not let me be at rest ! ” The ceremony of the queen’s coronation was next day to have been followed by her public entry into Paris ; and the king was desirous to see the preparations and triumphal arches that were erecting.

He is murdered by Ra- valliac.

About four o’clock in the afternoon, on the fourteenth of May, dinner being over, the king went in his coach, with the dukes of Epernon, and Montbaçon, the marquisses de la Force, and Mirebeau, and messieurs de Ravardin, Roquellan, and Liancourt. The coachman was ordered to drive to the cross of Tiroy, and from thence to the church-yard of St. Innocent, from whence it turned into the narrow street of la Ferroniere, where it was stopt by two carts meeting. The king had sent his guards before ; one of his pages was busy before the coach horses in clearing the passage ; another was behind, tying his garter, and the rest had gone round by the church-yard. While the coach was thus stopt, a young man, named Ravalliac, who had for some time meditated the murder, stept upon one of the spokes of the hind wheel, and aimed a-cross the duke of Epernon, a blow, with a knife, which struck the king, and he called out, “ I am wounded.” The assassin, with amazing quickness, repeated the blow, which divided the vena cava, and proved instantly mortal. Ravalliac might have escaped had he thrown the bloody knife under the coach and run off ; but he remained stupified as it were, upon the spoke, and the the duke of Epernon having prevented a gentleman from killing him, ordered the coach doors to be drawn up, and the body was reconducted to the Louvre. Thus died, by the hand of an assassin, Henry IV. in the thirty-eighth year of his reign over Navarre, the twenty-first over France, and the fifty-eighth of his age; and his body was interred on the twenty-ninth of June.

The bright side of Henry's character is easily known by His character, the prodigious difficulties he surmounted in his own person, before he made his way to the crown of France; and by the happy state to which he raised his subjects, whom he dearly loved, from anarchy, and misery of every kind. His strong propensity to gaming arose from his love of money; but no prince was more excusable than he was in that respect. He reflected on the distresses which the low state of their finances had brought upon his predecessors; and he bestowed vast sums, not only upon magnificent palaces, and public works, but in the encouragement of commerce, manufactures, and the fine arts. He was master of ready wit, and his style, both in speaking and writing, was flowing and manly. He railly'd, (especially his own foibles) with a good grace; so that they who knew him, were not shocked at a certain levity he indulged in his behaviour, and vanity of self applause, that would have appeared ridiculous in any other man. We have already taken notice of his passion for women; but we cannot think, with his encomiasts, that it did not on some occasions affect the affairs of his government. Not only he, but his minister, Sully, were weak enough to believe in judicial astrology; but it was a weakness in common with the greatest names on the continent of Europe. The frankness and generosity of Henry's temper, made almost all his subjects his friends before his death; for though he was a deep politician, he never was known to forfeit his word when he passed it in favour either of a doubtful friend, or a reconciled enemy.

Henry had no issue by his first queen, Margaret of Valois. and issue. By his second wife, Mary de Medici, he had the dauphin, the duke of Orleans, who died the year after himself, and a third son, Gaston, who succeeded to the title of Orleans. He had likewise three daughters, Elizabeth, married to Philip IV. of Spain; Christina, the wife of Amadeus, duke of Savoy; and Henrietta Maria, the queen consort of Charles I. of England. His issue by his mistresses, was so numerous, (and perhaps, so uncertain likewise) that their names cannot be admitted here. In his person, Henry was among the tallest of the middle sized men. His face is well known by his pictures, which are said to have a striking resemblance; and though he made very free with his constitution, yet the gout was almost the only disease that gave him disquiet.

Lewis XIII. surnamed the Just.

Doubts
concerng-ing his murder.

THE public is, to this day, greatly divided with regard to the original authors of the assassination of Henry IV. Though it is almost certain, that Ravalliac had no accomplices, and was actuated only by his own disturbed brain, which had suggested to him, that it was lawful to kill the king, because he tolerated two religions in his dominions; and that the vast preparations he was making were intended against the pope; yet it is certain, there was somewhat very suspicious in the unconcerned behaviour of the Spaniards before his death; and the Jesuits were not thought to be blameless.

His ten wishes.

It is a known fact, that Henry used to express himself to be extremely earnest in accomplishing ten things, which he called his wishes. The first was, that he might obtain the grace and assistance of God; the second, that he might die in the full possession of his senses; the third, that he might secure the exercise of the protestant religion; the fourth, that he might obtain a divorce from his wife, Margaret; the fifth, that he might restore France to her ancient glory; the sixth, that he might recover Navarre, Flanders, or Artois, from the Spaniards; the seventh, that he might gain in person, one victory over the king of Spain, and another over the Ottoman emperor; the eighth, that he might reduce his protestant subjects to their duty, without making use of violence; the ninth, that his great dukes of Epernon, Bouillon, and Trimouille, should be so far humbled as to implore his clemency; and the last, that he might live to execute his great design. It is on account of the three last of those wishes that we have reserved them for this place.

The protestants, at the time of Henry's death, enjoyed a state of independency, which might have been dangerous to any other prince but Henry, who, by the good faith he had always observed towards them, entirely conciliated their affections. The dukes of Bouillon, and Trimouille, behaved as became good subjects; but the character, and conduct, of the duke of Epernon is almost singular in history. He had, as we have already seen, been raised by the partial favour of Henry III. but through all the remaining part of his life, he seemed to forget that he had ever been a subject, or that he had any superior. He long maintained himself, without any connections, against the leaguers, the royal, the protestant, and the patriot parties in France; and Henry, at the time of his death, both respected and feared him, having raised him to be colonel general of his infantry. This stream of good fortune was owing to Epernon's known intrepidity; and even his pride, for which he was more noted than any man of his time, contributed towards towards it; for Henry, and the public, thought it to be of such a nature as did not suffer him to stoop to dissimulation, or meannesses. As to Henry's grand design, the last of his wishes, it was now a heavy lump, that could not be re-animated but by his spirit. All knowledge of it, with certainty, was, its having the reduction of the house of Austria for its capital object.

The prince of Conde remained still absent from court. The and the count of Soissons had retired from it in disgust before queen de-Henry's death. The absence of those two great princes of clared re- the blood was of infinite service to the queen-mother, gent. who soon recovered from the grief into which her husband's murder had thrown her; and the duke of Epernon, the very evening of Henry's death, entering, with his hand upon his sword, the room where the parliament was assembled, obliged the members to declare the queen regent, by which they exceeded the constitutional powers invested in them; because such a declaration ought only to have come from an assembly of the states. The duke of Sully thought the complexion of the court was so little favourable to himself, and the protestants, that he retired to his government of the Bastile, with a resolution to have held it out, if matters had come to extremity; but the edict of Nantes being confirmed, and a favourable proclamation for the protestants being published, the duke went to court, and was well received.

The day after Henry's death, the young king held a bed The king of justice, in which, the tutorship, and regency, was so- holds a lemnly confirmed to the queen; but it was remarkable, bed of that the chancellor Sillery, who was the queen's declared justice, partizan, collected the votes of the presidents of the parliament, before those of the princes of the blood, or the peers. The punishment of the late king's murder was next taken into consideration. The relation of the dreadful death the assassin suffered, his examinations, his answers, and the conjectures about those who employed him, have filled up volumes, but are matters rather of curiosity than information; and the contradictions and uncertainty that mingle with them, render them unfit for general history. It is certain, that the furious enthusiasm with which Ravalliac was possessed, sufficiently accounts for Henry's murder, without our having recourse to any other suggestions, however plausible they may appear. The prince of Conde was at Milan, when Henry was murdered; but firmly resisted all the addresses made him by the conde de Fuentes, to set up a claim to the crown. The count of Soissons had already returned to Paris, where the queen gained him over to her interest; and he was followed by the prince of Conde, who being poor, accepted of large appointments, and was quieted; so great was the influence.

of the vast sums which fell into the queen's hands upon her husband's death. The council of regency was numerous, but the queen regent was chiefly directed in the choice of her cabinet council, by Conchini, who was made marquis d'Ancre, and his wife, who was, in a manner, the queen's sole favourite; both of them Italians.

State of France.

When the execution of the late king's grand design came under the consideration of the cabinet, they found themselves greatly embarrassed. Henry's connections with the German princes, and the king of England, had gone so far, that twelve thousand men were sent, under the marshal de la Chatre, towards Juliers, but that city was reduced by the protestants, before the French troops arrived. The plan of the French court was pacific, and they intimated the same to James, who sent over the lord Wotton, as his ambassador, to Paris. James, at the same time, entered into a league offensive and defensive with France; and Boderie, the French ambassador at London, paid him sixty thousand crowns. The connections of religion had been, during the late reign, disused in France; but they were now resumed, and the queen attached herself to the courts of Rome, Madrid, and Florence. The duke of Savoy, with whom the late king had entered into very strong engagements, was left to the mercy of Spain, and obliged to send his son, prince Philibert, to ask pardon of that court. As to the queen, she behaved with great address, and affected moderation towards all parties.

crowned.

The cardinal Joyeuse crowned the king at Rheims on the seventeenth of October; and, to all appearance, the duke of Epernon, who was above joining with any party, was the first minister of state. Whatever private differences might be among the contending factions of the Roman catholics at court, they united in rendering the duke of Sully's public spirited, but parsimonious, councils, so useless to the state, and so dangerous to himself, that he retired to his estate at Sully, after surrendering into the queen-regent's hands his superintendency of the finances, and his government of the Bastile.

Differences among the protestants

It is an amazing circumstance, that the duke of Bouillon carried his resentment against the duke of Sully farther than the chancellor, the secretary Villeroy, and the president, Jeannin, (who had always opposed him) did theirs. He endeavoured to ruin him with the protestants, in an assembly they were permitted to hold at Saumur; in which case, Sully must have fallen an easy sacrifice to the Roman catholic party. He was disappointed, for Mornay was chosen president of the assembly. The members addressed the queen in favour of Sully, in so strong a manner, that she durst not take from him either his government of Poitou, or the mastership of the ordnance.

Among

Among the other arts made use of by the queen, to retain or encrease her authority, she employed that of amusing the parliament, and the public, with fruitless enquiries into the late king's death, upon rumours and surmises raised, probably, after that melancholy event. All her practices could not prevail with the parliament to suffer her creatures, the jesuits, to open their college for the instruction of youth; and the writings of Mariana were burnt, as those of Bellarmino were suppressed, because they favoured the doctrine of king-killing. This year, the king's brother, the duke of Orleans, died, and was succeeded in his title by his younger brother, Gaston; and the crown of France, about the same time, lost one of its firmest supports by the death of the duke of Maine, who had been formerly its greatest enemy.

The queen, all this while, was cultivating the secret intimacy she had formed with the other Roman catholic powers upon the continent; and, by the mediation of the pope and the great-duke of Tuscany, a match was concluded between the French king and the eldest infant of Spain, whom king James had demanded in marriage for his eldest son the prince of Wales. Some of the heads of the protestants of France looked upon this match as the forerunner of their destruction; but the duke of Bouillon remained still in high favour at court; where the Spanish ambassador publicly signed a treaty of marriage between Philip, prince of Asturia, his catholic majesty's eldest son, and the princess Elizabeth, eldest sister to Lewis. The queen-regent prevailed with the duke of Bouillon to go to England, and to endeavour to reconcile James to the double marriage; and to offer her second daughter, Christina, in marriage to the prince of Wales. All that the duke did, according to French authors, was to propose a marriage between the princess, daughter to James, and his nephew the elector-palatine, the richest and most powerful prince in Germany, except the emperor; which match afterwards took place. James did not seem to dislike the proposed match between the prince and Christina. The duke of Bouillon tempted James with the offer of five hundred thousand crowns as the fortune of the princess; but the prince of Wales, Henry, received the proposal coldly, and treated the whole as a matter of convenience.

Intrigues
of the duke of Bouillon.

It certainly was the interest of the queen-regent to engage England, at this time, in her interest. The princes of Conde and Soissons began to be uneasy when they saw that they were called to the council-board for little more than form-sake. They quarrelled with the ministry, who, they said, were lavishing the treasures of the late king upon worthless subjects. Conchini sided with neither party; but, upon the death of the count of Soissons, which happened about this time, he leaned towards the prince of Conde, who once more returned returned to court; and, at last, a perfect reconciliation seemed to take place between him and d'Ancre.

Proposals of marriages.

The protestants were not less divided among themselves than the Roman catholic princes and ministers. Though the duke of Bouillon had united himself to the court of England, yet he never could prevail with his party to abandon the duke of Sully, or to embrace the dangerous projects he had in view, and which centered in rendering himself the head of a protestant republic within France. He pretended to the queen-regent, that it would be always in his power to counterballance the interest of the princes; and that, if the crown would give its protection to the protestants, the king would always find in them a faithful support. She believed, or seemed to believe, him; and he discouraged the meetings of the party at Prives and Rochelle, because their proceedings were not to his liking. He, at the same time, flattered the queen with the hopes that a match might be effected between the princess Constance and Charles, prince of Wales, who had succeeded to his brother Henry, now dead.

Great art of d'Ancre
and his wife,

While those intrigues were going forward, the inferior people in France were reduced to the utmost misery, through the spirit of dissipation and luxury that prevailed at court; and, under pretence of reforming the police, an edict was published, rendering it penal to relieve a beggar in the streets of Paris; which filled the provinces with objects of famine and misery. The chevalier de Guise, son of the duke, who had been assassinated at Blois, killed the two barons of Lux, father and son, who had attached themselves to the ministers; and the queen pardoned him, on the ridiculous pretext that it was highly generous in a man of the chevalier's rank, to condescend to fight a duel with a person of inferior quality. This proceeded from the queen-regent (whatever appearances she might assume) being, in secret, entirely directed by Galigai, d'Ancre's wife, whose power over her was such, that people who were far above the vulgar, attributed it to witchcraft. It was not long before the queen found it absolutely necessary to check the too great ascendancy which the princes had in the ministry; and d'Ancre, for some time, to appearance, was under a cloud at court.

He soon recovered his credit by persuading the prince of Conde, the dukes of Maine, Bouillon, and Nevers, to quit the court; and he took advantage of their absence to negotiate with the ministers whom he proposed to unite with the princes against the duke of Epernon and the house of Guise; and the cement of the union was to be a marriage between his son and Villeroy's daughter. His receiving the baton of a marshal of France seemed to turn his brain; and he was now raised to such a pitch of greatness, that he disdained not only the alliance of his family with that of Villeroy, but all his former connections.

D'Ancre

D'Ancre now stood upon his own footing against the who are princes, the ministers, the duke of Epernon and the duke of hated by Guise. The princes retired from court, and met at Mezi- the nobieres, where they digested all the grievances of the state in lity.
the form of a manifesto, which was sent by the prince of Conde to the queen. She laid it before the council, and recalled the dukes of Epernon and Guise to court. An answer to the manifesto of the princes was then drawn up; and the grand charge, that of public profusion, was shewn to be chiefly owing to themselves, who had received and dissipated vast sums of public money. At the same time, her majesty promised that a meeting of the states should be called as soon as the king should be of age.

The manifesto of the princes was far from having the effect they intended. The parliament disregarded it; and not only the nobility, but the people in general, were disposed to support the royal authority. The dukes of Epernon and Guise were for proceeding against the princes as rebels, but d'Ancre and his friends proposed a negotiation, which was accepted of; and meetings were held, first at Soissons, and next at Menchaud. It soon appeared that the root of the grievances complained of lay in the necessities of the princes, which had been occasioned by their own extrava-gancies.

An accommodation took place. A meeting of the states A treaty, was agreed on; redress was promised of some grievances, and others were postponed. The prince of Conde had an annual appointment allowed him of four hundred and fifty thousand livres, besides the town of d'Amboise as a surety.
The duke of Mayenne's appointment was three hundred thousand, and that of the duke of Longueville one hundred thousand, livres a year. A pardon was likewise stipulated for all that had passed, and the conduct of the princes was to be approved of at court.

Great difficulties occurred in ratifying this treaty, which which is was considered to be so disgraceful to the royal authority. ratified.
The queen had bought from the duke of Roan the colonelgeneralship of the Swiss, and given it to Bassompierre. She had a fine army on foot; and the dukes of Epernon and Guise, at the head of the courtiers, were for rejecting the treaty. The queen, who had been prevailed upon, with difficulty, not to resign the regency, was inclined to have followed that advice; but was dissuaded from it by d'Ancre and the president Jeannin, who made her sensible that the princes, in case of a civil-war, would certainly be supported by the protestants both of France and Germany; and by Spain and other foreign powers; and that the forward zeal of the dukes of Epernon and Guise proceeded from the desire each had to succeed Montmorenci, who was just dead, as constable. Villeroy joined with them in their sentiments, and the treaty of Menchaud was confirmed. The duke of Vendosme
had

had been put under arrest by the queen, but had escaped out of prison; and, though he was included in the treaty of Menebaud, he took arms against the duke of Montbazon, who had been appointed governor of Bretagne. The son of Henry IV. and the heiress of the house of Mercœur, soon put him at the head of a party, which gave him possession of Blaye; and the prince of Conde, at the same time, with a like disregard to the treaty of Menebaud, endeavoured to obtain possession of Poitiers.

The queen, finding herself thus abused on all hands, came to a resolution full of dignity and spirit. She marched, with her son at the head of his army, first to Poitiers, and then into Bretagne, with such a shew of resolution as overawed the prince of Conde and the duke of Vendosme, who made their submissions; and the fortress which the latter had erected at Blaye was demolished.

The king
declares himself
of age.

Lewis, upon his return to Paris, in September, declared himself to be of age in parliament; and, by the first act of government he emitted, he confirmed the edict of Nantes. The assembly of the states met at Sens, from whence they were removed to Paris; but their resolutions came to nothing, each order being embroiled with the other. The most remarkable affair that passed in this assembly, was a motion brought in by the third estate, which consisted of magistrates representing the people, for the publication of a law, That no person, spiritual or temporal, has a right to dispose of the kingdom, or to release the subjects from their oath of allegiance; and, that the opinion of its being lawful to kill kings, was impious and detestable.

We mention this as a proof that the spirit of the league, which was composed chiefly of the third estate, was now extinguished, and that the people of France, in general, were inclined to support the royal authority against the spiritual, and all intermediate, orders.

Debates
in the assembly
states.

Cardinal Perron opposed the promulgation of this law by fulsome encomiums upon the papal power; and declared, that he should be obliged to excommunicate all those who should persist in maintaining, that the church has not the power of deposing kings. This insolent doctrine was not resented by the body of the nobility, who, from the hatred they had to the third estate, joined, on this occasion, with the clergy, and it was tacitly understood, that a king might make so bad a use of his power, as that he might be deposed. It is also remarkable, that, so much were the queen-mother and her descendants creatures of the court of Rome, they did not support the decree of the third estate; which would have rendered the king absolute and independent. The result of the whole was, that all the grievances of the kingdom were laid open, but not one of them redressed.

Upon the dissolution of the assembly of the estates, the princes connected themselves with the parliament, which was then at variance with the ministry ; and espoused their cause out of hatred to the duke of Epernon, who had insulted them. The prince of Conde resigned the government of State of Amboise, as a token that he thought he had nothing to the court dread while he was united with the parliament ; and the queen-mother, through the overbearing spirit of d'Ancre, gave that government to one Luynes. He was a young man of an ignoble original ; and, having been recommended to Henry IV. was put about the person of Lewis ; whose affections he gained by making him a present of two magpies, which he had trained to strike down little birds in the same manner as hawks do the greater. His manners were insinuating, and it was thought he had the finest person of any young man in France.

D'Ancre's design in thus pushing the fortune of an obscure personage, was, undoubtedly, that he might find, in his growing favour with the king, a resource, if the countenance of the queen should fail him ; but the power of d'Ancre became now terrible to the parliament itself, whose arrets were superceded by the edicts of the council of state. Being made governor of Amiens, he ordered the chief magistrates of the place to be assassinated ; and he would have hanged the provost-marshal without any form of trial, if the garrison had not threatened to mutiny. The prince of Conde having, by the king, been prohibited from assisting at the deliberations of the parliament, had retired to a private life, from whence he was drawn by the fresh insolences of the favourite. He published a new manifesto, which comprehended all the grievances in his former, and mentioned the manifest neglect of enquiring into the authors of the late king's murder, and the violation of the edict of Nantes, with the introduction of Jews and magicians into the kingdom ; concluding with a kind of request, that the king would delay his marriage, the consummation of which the queen-mother had greatly at heart, till the internal affairs of his kingdom were settled. The queen-mother saw the storm that was impending over her and her favourites, and persuaded the king to act in his own name. He took two millions and a half out of the bastile ; put himself at the head of twelve thousand horse and four thousand foot, and marched towards the frontiers to receive his bride ; while another army of twenty thousand men, under marshal Bois Dauphin, was raised to oppose that of the princes.

France was now divided into more parties than, perhaps, which is it ever had known. The parliament maintained its authority by the deference which the people shewed to its edicts, and the persons of its members. D'Ancre was strong by the countenance and presence of the king, who was attended by the dukes of Guise, Epernon, Elbeuf, and Uzes. The protestants had for their heads the dukes of Bouillon, Trimouille, Sully, Rohan, the marshal de Lesdiguières, and the sieur Mornay ;

Mornay; and they might have given the law to the other parties, had their leaders, who were as able men as France ever produced, been united in any one principle; but each had different views and different maxims. The party of the prince of Conde, who was first prince of the blood, was strengthened by the dukes of Longueville, Maine, a vast number of the nobility, and, occasionally, by the duke of Bouillon, who undertook to negotiate between him and the protestants. The ministry may be considered as a fourth party, on account of the great credit which the chancellor, the president Jeannin, and others, had with the queen-mother; by which they sometimes checked the towering ambition of the favourite.

Marriage
king.

The king, by this time, had received his bride; given away his sister; and was himself married, on the twenty-seventh of November, at Bordeaux. The war went on, but not much to the advantage of the royalists. The dukes of Nevers and Vendosme joined the cause of the princes; and, an accommodation being effected between the prince of Conde and the protestants, he passed the Loire to join their army, which was commanded by the duke of Roan. It soon appeared that the prince's party was no better than a rope of sand; for, though all the protestant Swiss in the king's pay left his service, as soon as war was declared against the protestants; yet the views of the dukes of Bouillon and Lefdiguieres were as different from those of the prince of Conde as his were from those of the dukes of Roan, Sully, and Trimouille; who were the only protestant chiefs that had acted with firmness and upon principle.

The court was well informed as to all those particulars, and found it no hard matter to amuse the prince of Conde by a negotiation, which he was inclined to accept of, but was overawed by the duke of Roan and his other two friends. Matters continued in a sort of suspense when the prince of Conde applied himself to the king of England; whose vanity was flattered, as usual, with the hopes of putting himself at the head of all the protestants in Europe. The bait took effect; and Sir Thomas Edmonds, the English minister in France, by his master's order, proposed an accommodation just as the king, at the head of his army, was preparing to give battle to that of the princes. It is said that the duke of Guise had orders to have seized the princes while they were in consultation about this proposal, but that he had advertised them of their danger. It is certain a suspension of arms was agreed on, and London was fixed upon for the place of treaty. The terms were soon settled. The prince of Conde was gratified in almost every demand he made, and placed at the head of the council. The government of Amiens was taken from d'Ancre; the protestants were promised full security for their religion and privileges; all edicts, declaring either them, or any of the party of the princes, princes, rebels, were revoked and annulled; and a redress of public grievances was stipulated. King James considered himself as the father of this peace, and sent orders to Edmonds to insist upon his being mentioned in the preamble, and that Edmonds should sign it as his ambassador. The duke of Bouillon, who, after making his own terms, had left his party to shift for themselves, insisted upon James being gratified in this; but he was opposed by the secretary Villeroy, who carried his point, the demand being disgraceful to the crown of France; upon which Edmonds threatened to leave that court.

The peace was concluded in the beginning of May, 1616, A new and the treaty sent to be ratified by the parliament of Paris. treaty. They verified, accordingly, the open articles; but made some difficulty of passing the secret ones, which were sent them sealed up, and contained the private terms that each of the principals had made for himself. Being informed that these secret articles were perfectly conformable to those granted by the edict of Nantes, they acquiesced.

It must be acknowledged that the prince of Conde, who Altera- was confined by sickness during the treaty, sacrificed by it tions at his own interest and those of his party. It was in vain for court. the most understanding of the protestants to represent to him, that the more favourable the terms granted him were, they were so many indications of an intention to break them. He was deaf to all their remonstrances. He received, by way of gratification, a million and a half of livres; he exchanged his government of Guienne for that of Berry and Touraine; and he pleased himself with the thoughts of being able to controul all the affairs of government, by being at the head of the council. Upon the conclusion of the peace, the chancellor, Sillery, lost the seals; which were given to William du Vair, president of the parliament of Aix; but, before he was turned out, the ministers grew sensible that they were hurting themselves.

This was the æra of favourites. The king of Spain was D'Ancre's guided by the duke of Lerma; the duke of Buckingham had power an absolute ascendancy over king James; as d'Ancre had continued. over the queen-mother and her son. Of the three, the duke of Lerma was, by far, the ablest minister; and he persuaded d'Ancre and his wife, that they could have no safety against the general hatred borne them by the French nation, but by depending on the protection of Spain. They had daily proofs of this hatred; for two of their footmen were hanged by sentence of the parliament of Paris, for having, by the marshal's order, beaten a shoe-maker, who commanded a patrolle that refused to suffer the marshal to leave Paris without a passport.

Every day was now diminishing the queen-mother's power over Lewis, and, therefore, d'Ancre entered into a close intimacy with the prince of Conde; who, on his arrival arrival at Paris, was, by the marshal's influence, placed at the head of the government. He was the dupe of his own politics; for pretending to act independently of the dukes of Bouillon and Maine, the former, who entirely guided the prince of Conde, persuaded him to take a formal leave of all friendship with the marshal, who immediately retired to Normandy. The duke of Bouillon was then, in fact, first minister to Lewis; and, though we are not certain as to the particulars of the schemes he suggested to the prince of Conde, yet they, undoubtedly, were dangerous; and, in reality, the discovery of them saved d'Ancre from ruin.

New alterations.

The duke of Bouillon, though he agreed with the protestants in religion, differed entirely with them in politics, and had often offered to break up their assembly at Rouen at the head of an army, as being composed of rebels. Both he and the prince of Conde had kept up a close but secret correspondence with king James; and the queen-mother received, or pretended to receive, undoubted information that he proposed to raise the prince of Conde to the throne of France; in which he was to be supported by the governors of the provinces, who, during their lives, were not to be removable by the crown. Whatever might have been in this intelligence, it is a well-known fact, that the prince of Conde, while he thought himself securely possessed of the French government, was suddenly arrested in the louvre by Themmes. The feeble effects made by his party for his deliverance and justification, warrant the suspicion of his black designs. He was no sooner seized than the duke of Vendosme (whose conduct, during the preceding dispute, had been very mysterious) the dukes of Guise, Maine, Nevers, Candale (eldest son to the duke of Epernon) Roban, Sully, la Trimouille, and Bouillon, with the other heads of the prince's party, precipitately left the court. The seals were taken from Du Vair and given to Mangot, who had been secretary of state; and his place was filled by the bishop of Laon, afterwards the famous cardinal Richlieu; while Barbin, a domestic favourite of the queen-mother, was made comptroller of the finances. There can be no doubt that the bishop of Lucon, from that day, had planned his rise and the ruin of the princes and the great nobility, which he afterwards so steadily pursued. As to the duke of Guise and his family, they continued in a state of neutrality, inclining more towards d'Ancre than the prince of Conde.

D'Ancre was considered by the people of Paris as the author of the prince's imprisonment, and the amazing change of the ministry, and they pulled down his house; while the king, by his mother's advice, published a proclamation vindicating his proceedings; and sent ministers to all the courts of Europe, to expose the practices of the princes and their party. To give the greater weight to his reasons, he raised three

three armies. One of them was sent into Chambagne under the duke of Guise, assisted by the marshals Themmes and Praslin; and they stripped the duke of Nevers of the chief places he held in that province. The marshal de Montigni had the like success at the head of another royal army sent into the Nivernois. The count de Auvergne, who had been just released from his long confinement in the bastile, and placed at the head of fourteen thousand men, besieged the duke of Maine in Soissons.

Though Luynes was a man of but a moderate capacity, Rise and yet his views were carried farther than the childish diversions character which had recommended him to his master's favour. D'An- of Luynes. cre might have maintained his footing in the government had he been possessed of common prudence; but he governed entirely by expedients; and always thought himself safe, while the ministers held their places by his recommendation. Luynes had proposed a match between his brother and the marshal's niece; which was set aside by the jealousy of Galigai, who was afraid that it might supplant her interest; and this made Luynes their enemy. The bishop of Lucon had far superior talents to the marshal and Barbin. They had sound sense, but were tired of being slaves to d'Ancré's caprice and ignorance; and the king, though no more than fifteen years of age, was soon persuaded, by Luynes, that all the disturbances and errors of his government was owing to the madness of his foreign favourite, and the desire the queen-mother had to render his majesty no more than a cypher in his own affairs. Luynes laid hold of some circumstances which operated strongly upon Lewis. She had made a troop of horse, which bore her own name, body-guards to the king; and Luynes persuaded him that he was little better than their prisoner.

The king, at first, had thoughts of placing the duke of Maine, who was still besieged in Soissons, at the head of his armies; but in that there was found both difficulty and danger. Appearances convinced the queen-mother that somewhat was in agitation to which she was a stranger, and Galigai prepared to return to Italy with all her and her husband's wealth; but he declared that he never would abandon fortune, which had hitherto courted him; and that he was resolved to see to what a height she would carry him.

After various consultations between the king and Luynes, D'Ancré the method was fixed on for dispatching d'Ancré; and Vi- murdered. tri, the captain of the king's guards, was pitched upon as the executioner; to which he consented. He was assigned, for his assistants, a set of the most desperate ruffians that could be procured in or about Paris. The twenty-fourth of April was fixed upon for the murder; and, about ten in the forenoon, d'Ancré entered the louvre, preceded by his ordinary guard of forty gentlemen-pensioners, and followed by as many more, who were excluded by the sudden shutting of the gate. While the marshal was upon the bridge, Vitri came up, attended by his band of ruffians; and the marshal's pensioners made a lane for him, supposing that the king was at hand. Vitri arrested the marshal, who clapped his hand upon his sword, and he instantly received three mortal wounds, discharged by the ruffians from as many pistols. The murder was no sooner committed than the king appeared at the window of his apartment; from whence he called out, "I am now king." The queen-mother's guards were removed from those of the king, and she found herself a prisoner in her own apartment; while d'Ancre's son, the marquis de Pene, and his wife, were put under an arrest; and the latter had orders to prepare herself for her trial.

To justify an assassination, the ends of which might have been answered in a legal way, Lewis, on the day it happened, sent three letters to his parliament, acquainting them with d'Ancre's death; that it was effected by his order; and that he intended to give his murderer, Vitri, the baton of marshal.

The queen-mother put under an arrest.

Had not the death of d'Ancre been attended with the above atrocious circumstances, or had he been removed in the way of justice, the king's views might have proved salutary to his people. The duke of Maine, and the other princes of the blood, returned immediately to their duty. The creatures of d'Ancre were displaced; the seals were restored to du Vair; Barbin was arrested; but the bishop of Lucon was admitted to the council-board, and to pay his attendance on the queen-mother. The unfortunate Galigai was tried by a commission sent to the parliament, and sorcery was one of the crimes laid to her charge. Some of her judges finding nothing could be proved against her, but that she was the queen-mother's favourite, were ashamed of the proceeding; others withdrew from the trial; but one of them asked her, What were the charms she had made use of to enchant her mistress. "My only charm," replied she, with a just indignation, "is the ascendancy which a great mind has over a little one." No defence could avail her; she was condemned and burnt; and, sentence being passed upon her husband, though already dead, his estate and effects were, by the parliament, confiscated to the king's use; while the queen-mother was sent in exile to Blais.

P. 300.

Luynes was now the favourite. He obtained from his master a gift of d'Ancre's immense estate; and all places of power and profit were invested in his creatures. He affected popularity, and the king sent a declaration to the parliament approving of his services. All the princes of the blood and great lords, who had leagued themselves against d'Ancre, now submitted to the king; and Luynes took care that their admission admission to favour should have the air of its being the effect of his recommendation. The duke of Maine, who continued to be besieged in Soissons, voluntarily sent the keys of that city to his majesty; and came to court, in company with the count d'Auvergne, who had besieged him.

Luynes not only succeeded to the possession of d'Ancre's Luynes sole estates; but to that of all his great places; especially those favourite of first gentleman of the bed-chamber and the king's lieutenant in Normandy. Hellier and Parfan, the chief murderers of d'Ancre, under marshal Vitri, were preferred; the one to command the guards under Vitri, and the other to the government of the bastille. Those removals and preferments were far from giving any consistency to the administration. Many who had expected promotion were disappointed, and plots and conspiracies against the lives of the queen-mother and Luynes were every day talked of. One Travail, who had been disappointed in his expectation of the archbishopric of Bourges, was broken alive upon the wheel, for a design against the queen-mother's life; and one Gignier's head was struck off for accusing the princes of the blood of a conspiracy against the king and Luynes.

The Spanish influence at the court of Lewis was far from being diminished by his marriage; but old Lesdigueres, who had been brought up in a thorough hatred of that crown, still continued to act for himself; for he, more than once, saved the duke of Savoy from ruin, notwithstanding his repeated orders from court for disbanding his forces; and which, without regarding them, he put into his pocket. He was, at this time, considered as the eldest and ablest general in Europe. The young nobility flocked from all quarters to learn from him the art of war; and he would have driven the Spaniards out of the duchy of Milan, had not the duke of Savoy persuaded him to agree to a peace, which had been procured for him from Spain by the court of France.

In December, 1617, Luynes persuaded the king to call an Assembly of his nobles at Rouen; where the late revolutions of the government were highly approved of; and the king rendered himself popular by his affability, and the readiness he expressed in receiving all the arrangements proposed by his nobles for the good of his people. The assembly breaking up, Luynes entered, with great advantage, upon his post of king's lieutenant in Normandy, and his other governments. Notwithstanding all his arts, the people could not help comparing the mean state from which he rose to the greatness in which they beheld him; and the preferments he heaped upon his two brothers added to his unpopularity; for they were filled, in derision, "The three kings." Luynes despised these invectives, which, in reality, proceeded either from disappointed malice, or the lower rank of people, and strengthened his interest by marrying the duke of Montbazon's daughter, and thereby allying himself to the duke of Roban.

The prince of Conde was still a prisoner in the bastile, and but little regarded, on account of his inconstancy and versatility; nor was the queen-mother, notwithstanding all the dutiful assurances of her son, in a much better condition at Blois. She was very justly pitied by the public, who did not fail to ascribe her misfortunes to Luynes; and he would willingly have procured her liberty, had he thought he could have done it with safety. Her advancement of d'Ancre and his family was almost the only impeachment that could be brought against her regency; and it was well known, that, in many of the most weighty affairs of government, she took the advice of Sillery, Jeannin, Villeroy, (who was now dead) and some other of the wealthiest and ablest men in France.

Luynes employed the duke of Roban and his father-in-law to make his peace with the queen-mother; but finding this was to no purpose, he removed the bishop of Lucon from her person; and he was exiled; first to a little abbey in Anjou, and then to Avignon, where he employed himself in composing books of devotion. Luynes then bribed all the queen-mother's attendants to betray her; and won over a bishop, whom her confident, Barbin, had chosen to go between them, to carry all their correspondence to himself; by which he picked out matter for bringing Barbin to a trial; where sentence of banishment was passed upon him; which the king converted into perpetual imprisonment.

Luynes carried his dissimulation, and the precautions he made use of, to continue himself in power, to incredible lengths. He is said to have prevailed upon Arnoux, the king's confessor, to have exacted an oath from his majesty, that he would discover no advice that Luynes gave him; and he employed the same Arnoux to prevail with the queen-mother to take an oath, and to sign an instrument, by which she engaged not to intermeddle in any affairs of state, nor to attempt to make her escape from Blois. The queen signed the instrument; but her confessor, being a jesuit likewise, easily satisfied her, that, as she was under a state of confinement, both her oath and obligation were void.

She is delivered by the duke of Epernon. The duke of Epernon was then at court; and, behaving with his usual haughtiness, he quarrelled about precedence with the keeper of the seals, whose part the king took; and he retired in disgust to his government of Metz. The duke had likewise a quarrel with Luynes, because the latter had procured from the court of Rome the promise of a cardinal's hat for de Gondi, afterwards the famous cardinal de Retz; which the duke expected for his own son, the archbishop of Tholouse. The partizans of the queen-mother, by the advice of the duke of Bouillon, who was now old and infirm, infirm, prevailed with her to apply to Epernon for her deliverance ; and, after a variety of secret transactions and correspondencies, he undertook it, though the king had sent him a positive command not to leave Metz.

The duke, notwithstanding he was beset by the spies of Luynes, and betrayed by his own servants, who carried his letters to court, conducted himself with such impenetrable art and address, that, upon the twenty-second of February, 1619, the queen escaped out of a high window by two ladders, which were formed into one, just as her son was preparing to send her a close prisoner to the castle of Amboise. She was carried by the archbishop of Toulouse to his father ; who received her, at Loches, at the head of a strong party of gentlemen on horseback, all his friends ; and from thence she removed to Angoulesme.

The queen-mother's escape, which happened while preparations were making for the marriage of the prince of Piedmont with the king's sister, the princess Christina, alarmed the favourite, who threatened to send an hundred thousand men against the duke of Epernon. Lewis, who, perhaps, still retained some remains of tenderness for his mother, consulted the duke of Bouillon, who gave him many strong and weighty reasons for an accommodation ; and a negotiation accordingly took place, notwithstanding the bloody invectives which the queen and her party, published against Luynes and his administration. The minister was obliged to give way ; and, by his advice, the king, with his own hand, recalled the bishop of Lucon from banishment ; and he was sent to Angoulesme to assist at the conferences. One Ruccellay, a worthless Italian ecclesiastic, who had been concerned in managing the queen-mother's escape, was jealous of being rivalled by the bishop ; and, after prevailing with the duke of Epernon to exclude him out of their counsels, he advised the queen-mother to make her peace, by abandoning the duke of Epernon. The queen rejected this advice, and discovered it to the duke ; who, after that, consulted the bishop of Lucon ; and the negotiation was brought to a period very favourable for the queen-mother.

She resigned the government of Normandy for that of Anjou, which was better situated for her corresponding with the duke of Epernon and the protestants ; and Angiers, with several other places, was given her for her security. It was stipulated that she should be absolute mistress of her own court and domain, and chuse her place of residence. In short, as Voltaire observes, Lewis entered into a treaty with the duke of Epernon, as between prince and prince ; and did not even venture to say in his declaration, that the duke had given him any cause of offence. The conclusion of this peace was a strong proof of the veneration the public retained for the queen-mother ; for few, or none of the great lords, besides the duke of Epernon, appeared for her ; and it is remarkable for having laid the foundation of the bishop of Lucon's greatness. She gave him proofs of her favour, by making his brother governor of Angiers; and, upon his being killed in a duel by de Themmes, the captain of her guard, who expected the government, she bestowed it upon the bishop's uncle.

She distrusts the court,

Upon the conclusion of the peace, it was discovered that the minister's creatures had formed a plot for blowing up the queen in the castle of Angoulême, and they were punished by the king; but the bishop of Lucon was now considered as the queen-mother's first minister; and, by his advice, she refused to trust herself at Paris, where she was expected, till all the terms of the treaty were fulfilled. This being done, the duke of Epernon conducted her to the frontiers of his government, to meet her son at Cousieres; and, upon the duke's taking his leave, the queen gave him from her finger a diamond ring; the only reward he ever received for the expensive and perilous services he had performed her. The interview between the queen-mother and the king passed with seeming tenderness on both sides, and they remained together for eleven days at Tours; but she could not be persuaded to venture herself at Paris, where the power of the favourite was daily encreasing.

and renews her complaints.

He had, from a natural timidity, given way to the reconciliation between the king and his mother; but to strengthen himself, he went to the bastille in person, and set at liberty the prince of Conde; who thenceforth professed himself his friend, and attended him to parliament; where Luynes took his seat, upon his being created a duke and peer of France. Some oblique reflections thrown upon the queen-mother's regency, in a declaration published by the king, upon the prince of Conde's release, embroiled her once more with her son; and the protestants sent deputies from their assembly at London (which the king, however, had ordered to be dispersed) assuring her of their best respects. This rendered her more peremptory in requiring to be justified in the measures of her regency.

Her great party.

In the mean while, the king was obliged, in person, to carry to the parliament some edicts for raising new taxes, which were not registered without a strong opposition; and, in the month of April, 1620, the king found himself, in a manner, deserted by his great princes and lords. This was occasioned by the intimacy which now subsisted between the prince of Conde and Luynes, which had rendered the other courtiers little more than cyphers. They complained that their services were disregarded, and that the power of the favourite was pernicious to France. The duke of Maine went to his government; the countess of Soissons, the dukes of Vendôme, Nevers, Trimouille, Roban, Retz, and many other nobles, went to the queen-mother's court at Angiers; where they found her more exasperated than ever at the favourite.

avourite. She complained that the terms of the treaty she had made had never been complied with on her son's part; and that she would enter into no farther negotiations, unless the parliament of France, or some foreign power, should become guarantees for the execution of the terms.

She and her friends were deceived in the opinion they had of the king, who, in his own person, was as brave as his father. He affected to appear as his own first minister, and though he permitted his servants to negotiate with the queen, he of a sudden put himself at the head of his army, and marched to Normandy, where, in the beginning of July, he made himself master of Rouen and Caen, and drove the duke of Longueville to Dieppe. This unexpected vigour threw the queen and her party into a consternation, which was increased by the firmness which the king discovered, in bestowing all vacant posts and governments upon those whom he knew to be devoted to his service, and to be the most obnoxious to the queen-mother's party. His presence seemed to inspire his army, while the queen-mother's party, finding that he was advancing to Pont de Ce, the most important post they had, was thrown into disorder and despondency. She was overpersuaded by the duke of Epernon, to reject the duke of Roban's advice to retire from Angiers to Bordeaux, where her party could have made a strong stand; and the bishop of Lucon, prevailed with her to set on foot a treaty. His success in this contributed to his advancement more than all that he had done before. The treaty was signed on the fifth of August; A peace, but not having been formally notified to the king, who loved fighting, on the eighth he attacked, and beat, part of the queen-mother's troops under the duke de Retz; but next day the peace was proclaimed. It contained a confirmation of the treaty of Angoulême, and a reinstating of the protestants in all the posts they held before the war, excepting those disposed of by the king in the intermediate time.

Though this peace promised fair, it was far from being Progress lasting. The king and queen entertained each other at of the Brisac with tears of affection; but no sooner were they king. separated than they relapsed into the power of their favourites, whose interests were as incompatible with those of their principals, as they were with each other. The bishop of Lucon, who had all the honour of the reconciliation, was then comptroller of the queen's household, and availed himself of it effectually; for he persuaded the queen mother, to procure a private promise from the king to obtain for him a cardinal's hat. The protestants, and the discontented Roman catholic lords, made separate bargains with the king for themselves; but the duke of Epernon resigned his arms without making any demands. His government of Guienne, is said to have been worth, to him, a million of livres, and he remained still independent, as indeed did almost all the other governors in France; so that, upon the whole, the king gained little by the late peace, but that of disjointing the confederacy for a while. This had some effect; for he checked the duke of Maine's power in the Bourdelois, and advanced to the principality of Bearn, where he restored the Roman catholic religion, and took the church lands from their protestant possessors. In this he met with no difficulty from the marquis de la Force; and in a few weeks an edict was published, erecting a parliament at Pax, and cancelling all the privileges that had been granted to the principality of Bearn, which was from thenceforth annexed to the crown of France.

An Assembly
at Rochelle.

p. 144.

The assembly of protestants at Rochelle would have resented those proceedings as violations of the edict of Nantes; but they were divided among themselves. They had been ordered by the king to separate under pain of being declared rebels; and indeed, nothing but self preservation can be admitted as a plea for their conduct at this time, which tended to the erection of a republic within the monarchy. They pleaded their services to Henry IV. whom they had placed on the throne, and the authority of the edict of Nantes, which had been received as a fundamental law of the kingdom. Luynes was still all powerful with the king, who was a weak bigot, and he sought to strengthen himself by the vast power of the clergy, by laying schemes, which he had not the genius to execute, for the destruction of the protestants. He had but little capacity to govern otherwise than by low practices; he therefore had no foresight, and his desire to please the clergy, who, in general, were in the interest of Spain, made him, at this time, overlook the fairest opportunity that had ever presented for humbling the house of Austria, by supporting the cause of the king of Bohemia, in Germany, which was now entirely ruined. The favourite upon the return of Lewis to Paris, prevailed with him to give the marshal's staff, with the government of Blaye, which was purchased from the viscount d'Aubeterre, for three hundred thousand livres, to his brother, de Cadenet. The ruin of the protestants being resolved on. Lefdiguieres, who was the greatest soldier, and the most powerful among them, was tempted to forsake them. He had been already created marshal, duke, and peer of France, and he was now offered the sword of constable, if he would change his religion. Deageant, who had been bred up under the queen-mother's former favourite, Barbin, who was the most artful man in France, was made president of the chamber of accounts, at Grenoble, that he might have a pretext to be near Lefdiguieres, and the negotiation was committed to his management.

Deageant

Deageant acquitted himself admirably well of his commission, and disposed Lefdiguieres to accept of the constable's sword, as soon as it should be offered to him in form. Roman Luynes, upon recollection, distrusted Deageant, and unknown to him, sent another agent, to offer the place of camp-master-general to Lefdiguieres, by which, in fact, he was to command the army, provided, he would agree that the constable's sword should be given to Luynes. Lefdiguieres resented this, at first, and consulted Deageant, whom he trusted, how he should behave, and Deageant, who was afraid of the favourite, persuaded him to comply. Luynes, accordingly received the constable's sword on the second of April 1621, and his greatness was now at its height. His second brother having married the countess of Chalnes, was declared a duke, and a peer of France, by her title, and had been sent ambassador to England; his other brother took the title of duke of Luxembourg, by having married the heiress of that house. The king was entirely pleased with his favourite's services; and by the daily progress he made in corrupting, and dividing the protestants. The latter continued against the king's express command, to hold their assembly at Rochelle. They had already divided the provinces they held into eight circles, in imitation of the German protestants, and to each circle they had assigned a chief. They more than suspected that Lefdiguieres, though he had not yet formally disowned their party, had been tampered with, and they offered to make him their general in chief, with an appointment of a hundred thousand crowns a month; but Lefdiguieres had gone too far, and the protestants were soon sensible that they had lost him.

The truth is, that great man had been outwitted, and is outwitted. now saw himself reduced to act under Luynes, by the king ed. taking the field against the protestants in the beginning of May. He was attended by all the great officers of the Roman catholic party, Lefdiguieres, among other; and, according to the duke of Roban, the success of the favourite in dividing and corrupting the protestants, was such, that Lewis, when he took the field was certain of victory. The constable commanded the army; and almost all the cautionary towns before which the king's army appeared, surrendered without resistance. The strong post of Saumer, St. Jean upon the Loire, was delivered up by its governor Du Plessis d'Angeli, Mornay; but St. Jean d'Angeli, where Soubise, the duke of Roban's brother, commanded, shut their gates against the royal army. Luynes, had, in vain, endeavoured to gain over those two brothers, who had always opposed the disloyal proceedings of their party at Rochelle, and Soubise bravely defended the place for thirty-five days; but was, at last, obliged to surrender it, and its fortifications were dismantled, though the garrison was not put to the sword. The

The town of Clerac, which had also made a vigorous defence, was likewise taken, and the king ordered its chief magistrate and four protestant ministers to be hanged. The protestant cause in France seemed now to be at its last gasp. It was abandoned not only by Lesdiguières, but by the dukes Trimouille, and Bouillon, and by Chatillon, grandson to the famous Coligni, with many other of its heads, and to give it the finishing blow, on the seventeenth of August, the king invested Montauban.

Siege of Montauban This city was defended by la Force, who had been driven out of Bearn by the duke of Epernon, and wanted now to repair the oversights he had committed. He accordingly, made a brave defence; and the severities shewn to the inhabitants of Clerac, seemed to inspire those of Montauban with a resolution to be buried in the ruins of their city rather than surrender it. As the royal army was hourly diminishing before this city, such was the ridiculous weakness of Luynes, that he sent for one Dominic, a Spanish Carmelite, (who is said to have assisted the Roman catholic's in Germany, to defeat the protestants at the battle of Prague) and this friar, after distributing his trinkets to the courtiers, desired the king to fire five hundred cannon shot at the town, assuring him that it would surrender at the last shot. The experiment was made, no success followed, and the siege was raised, with the loss of half of the royal army.

Death of Larnes the constable. By the death of du Vair, the post of keeper of the seals was vacant, and Lewis gave it to his constable, who died of a fever before Monheur, a little town in Guienne, which he had persuaded his master to besiege, that he might recover the reputation he had lost at Montauban. He had scarcely expired, when his soldiers stripped his quarters of all they could carry off, and his body was abandoned with hardly a sheet to cover it. It is thought that death was kind in taking him out of the world, before his sovereign, who now both hated and despised him, had delivered him up to the resentment of an incensed court and people.

The war renewed. In January 1622, the king entered Paris, full, as is said, of gloom and discontent, not only for his bad success before Montauban, but for the blood he had been forced to shed. Upon the death of Luynes, he had committed the care of his army, near Montauban, to the duke of Angoulême, and the marshal de Thiennes; and old cardinal de Retz, with the count de Schomberg, had seized the reins of civil government; but were solicited by the prince of Conde to be admitted as their partner. In the winter, the protestants recovered Clerac; but in other parts of Nantes, the war was carried on greatly to their disadvantage. Lesdiguières, though then a Roman catholic, was for peace, and was joined by the queen-mother, the chancellor, and de Puyfeux,

Puyfieux, who had now great credit. The new ministers, the prince of Conde, and the duke of Guise, practised upon the king's bigotry and weakness; and the murder of the president de Crosse, by the protestants of Montpellier, while he was treating with the duke of Roan, exasperated Lewis so much, that he resolved once more to take the field in person against them; though the duke of Roan had put four of the murderers to death, who were all he could detect out of forty.

During the winter, the war was carried on with the most Soubise horrid circumstances of barbarity on both sides; for the beaten protestants under Soubise, were so indigent, that they were obliged to commit many unwarrantable acts of plunder and devastation. The king in the beginning of April, at the head of eight thousand foot, and a thousand horse, marched against Soubise, who had made an irruption into Poitou, and forced him to retire to the little island of Rhe, near Rochelle, where he entrenched himself with about seven thousand men. Lewis, who was now joined by the prince of Conde, and other great officers, set them an example of conduct and intrepidity in his own person. He forded, with great hazard, the small arm of the sea that divides Rochelle, from the island of Rhe, attacked Soubise, killed, or took three thousand of his men, forced Soubise himself to escape by swimming, with four hundred only, while the remainder endeavouring to escape, were put to death, by the peasantry, whom they had plundered. Tomeins was retaken from the protestants, in the beginning of May, and burnt to the ground. The siege of Rouen cost a great deal of blood; but the duke of Epernon, and marshal Vitri, reduced the place in sixty days. To do justice to Lewis, he seldom or never was cruel, but when he was practised upon by bigotry or interest; and never was there a prince beset by more wicked courtiers and ministers than he was. When persuasion, money, or honours, could answer the purposes of severity, he employed them, for he gave a marshal's staff, and two hundred thousand crowns for the surrender of St. Foix, by the marquis de la Force, who had lost the government of Bearn.

But it was impossible to soften the enthusiasts among the The king hugonots. In the beginning of June, the town of Negre-victorious. pelisse was summoned by the prince of Conde to surrender, but the inhabitants would hear of no capitulation; and when it was stormed, every living person within it, was put to the sword, excepting ten persons, who being brought before the king, refused to accept of mercy, and, at their own request, were hanged upon trees, in their own gardens; after which, the town was burnt to the ground. To recount all the particulars of this campaign would far exceed our proposed bounds; it is sufficient to say, that the king, and the prince of Conde, reduced a great number of places; but but were obliged to raise the siege of Bristle. The duke of Sully had so good an opinion of the king's intentions and good faith, that he laid at his feet the keys of all the places, in which he commanded, and his example was followed by other leaders of the protestants, of whom the duke of Rohan was now considered as the head. He was a brave, active, and honest man, but perhaps, too jealous of the intentions of Lewis, and his court. He had during the administration of Luynes been offered his own terms, if he would submit; but he kept his arms in his hand, and in the beginning of the year 1622, he was chosen the hugonots general of the Lower Languedoc, in an assembly of five of their provinces. He found the protestants so miserably divided among themselves, that nothing but his own invincible principle of conscience, could have continued him in their party. In the mean while, Montpellier was besieged, and the protestants within it, made so obstinate a defence, and such slaughter among the royal army, that the duke of Lesdiguières, who was now made constable of France, proposed a meeting with the duke of Rohan, who carried in to the inhabitants, the terms of a capitulation, which were at first rejected. The king's army encreasing every day, and the siege, though badly managed by the prince of Conde, who had the direction of it, was so warmly pressed that the besieged at last listened to a capitulation, which was proposed by the duke of Rohan, and was followed by a general peace between the king, and his hugonot subjects. This peace was so much to the advantage of the latter, that it does vast credit to the moderation of Lewis. By it, the edict of Nantes was confirmed; the privileges of the protestants were restored, and a general amnesty was passed, while the duke of Rohan had a large pecuniary consideration for his losses during the war.

peace.

Intrigues
at court.

The prince of Conde was so much disgusted by the peace of Montpellier, that he first left the court, and upon the death of his friend, the cardinal de Retz, the kingdom. The count of Schomberg still kept his ground, at the head of the finances; but was strongly opposed by the chancellor, Sillery, and his son, Physieux, who had in a manner forced themselves into the chief management of affairs. Towards the end of the year, Lewis, after making a triumphal tour through several of his provinces, returned to Paris, where he found his ministry divided. The chancellor, and his son, sought to strengthen their interest by favouring the courts of Rome and Madrid, and did all they could to set aside the treaty of Montpellier, by sending private orders to the king's officers to disregard its terms. The duke of Rohan endeavoured to establish the observance of the treaty, and had received encouragement from the king for that purpose; but upon his return to Montpellier he was put under arrest by Valence, the commandant there, who was brother-in-law to Puyfieux. Lewis, however, no sooner heard of the duke's confinement, than he disapproved of it, and ordered him to be set at liberty. This contrariety of sentiments between the king and his ministers, made way for the queen-mother's admission into the council, and opened a fair prospect to the ambition of the bishop of Lucon, now cardinal Richelieu. He had, by the queen-mother's Italian interest, obtained his hat from the pope, with whom, Lewis privately, opposed his own commendation. After receiving this honour, Lewis disliked him so much, that he made an express bargain with his mother that he should not be admitted to the council board. He had the art to represent this to his dependents and correspondents, as a particular mark of the royal favour, in thereby exempting him from the fatigue of business; and he foresaw what soon after happened, that the dissensions among the ministers must raise him to the direction of affairs.

The marquis de Vieuville had succeeded Schomberg in the administration of the finances; and consequently was considered as an associate with Sillery, and his son, in the ministry. He ingratiated himself with the king, by working upon his natural distrust and jealousy. He represented the chancellor, as being incapable of business, and his son, as being so overbearing as to forget the decency due to the royal authority. Vieuville had contributed to raise Richelieu; the queen seconded his suggestions, and the seals were given in the beginning of the year 1624, to Aligre. In a few days after Puyfieux received his dismissal, and the father, and son, were by a message from the king, ordered to retire from court. Vieuville, then presided over a new cabinet council, which was composed of the cardinal de la Rochefoucault, the constable Lefdiguieres, and Aligre, with Moni. de Bouillon. The queen-mother had made the fortune of Vieuville, who in gratitude could not reject her earnest instances, that Richelieu should be admitted into the cabinet, which he was, notwithstanding the reluctance of the king, who declared that he was not to be considered as a minister of state. Richelieu publicly pretended that this honour was in a manner forced upon him, but that his majesty was graciously pleased to continue his favour, by excusing him from the fatigues of ministerial business. About this time, the impolitic match, which king James had so long solicited at the court of Spain, was broken off; and the lord Kensington had been sent to France to treat of a marriage between the prince of Wales, and the king's sister, the princess Henrietta Maria. His lordship was favourably received, and found Lewis well inclined to the marriage; though his violent Roman catholic subjects opposed it. The queen-mother, very reasonably, insisted upon her having a voice in the disposal of her daughter, and and prevailed so far, that when the lord Kensington, and the earl of Carlisle, were sent from England to conclude the treaty of marriage, that cardinal Richelieu managed the conferences, at the head of a committee of the council. He behaved, on this occasion, with infinite address; for he blamed Vieuville, for having granted too favourable terms to the court of England, and thereby got the negotiation entirely into his own hands. It is certain, that he would have concluded the match upon worse terms than those for which he blamed Vieuville, whose ruin he soon effected; and the conclusion of the marriage treaty, was, perhaps, the first step which he took as a minister, for bringing about his great design of humbling the house of Austria, both in Spain and Germany. It was agreed that the princess should have eight hundred thousand crowns for her portion; but Richelieu desisted from the demands which had been made when the Spanish match was in agitation, of a toleration for the Roman catholics in England, and the erection of a popish chapel in London. Lewis, however, employed the archbishop of Ambrun, to go to England in disguise, where he privately obtained many favours for those of his religion, who were, at that time, under a general persecution.

Character
of Richelieu.

We are now to consider Richelieu as being the first, as he was soon after, the sole, minister of France. Nature seldom combines so opposite qualities in one constitution, as entered into his. He was a mere smatterer in learning, and a shallow pretender to wit, but he affected both characters so much, that he bore an implacable hatred to all who offered to dispute the one, or to ridicule the other. Though he had spent all the time he could spare from business in writing books of devotion, yet he had a passion to be the man of pleasure, and courted his mistresses, the chief of whom was one Marion del Orme, in the cavalier dress of those days, equipped with a hat, a sword and a feather. His vanity was such, that he made love to the queen consort, Anne of Austria, who both detested and despised him; yet such was the ascendancy he had over the genius of Lewis, that his presumption, though discovered, did him no harm. In conversation, he was an intolerable pedant, and his private life would have furnished out matter for a sarcastic comedy. With all those weaknesses, his judgment was sound, his courage intrepid, and in matters of government, his views were more just and comprehensive than those of any minister, that lived in that age. Next to the suppression of the power of Austria, he had at heart that of the French hugonots, and next to that, the crushing the overgrown power of the great French lords; schemes that to any other man at that time, must have appeared impracticable. His vanity rendered him a generous patron of learning, learning, and he offered to purchase from Corneille, at a vast rate, the reputation of being the author of the Cid.

This new minister made it a maxim of his conduct never to do things by halves; and, to rid himself of all restraint, he persuaded the king to send Vieuville a prisoner to the castle of Amboise. To quell the clamour of the Spanish and popish faction, he obtained from Charles, who succeeded his father in the throne of England, unusual indulgences for the Roman catholics, and they were most ungenerously printed and published in France. Richelieu had the good fortune to find that the English minister, Buckingham, fell in with his views, as to humbling the house of Austria; but he was a little disconcerted when he found that Buckingham wanted to have the direction of that measure. Upon the accession of Charles, Buckingham went to France to bring over the young queen, whose marriage had been concluded by the lord Kensington, now earl of Holland, and the earl of Carlisle, and she had been espoused by the duke of Chevreuse, as proxy for Charles. The court of France had never seen any thing equal to the splendor and richness of Buckingham's dress and equipages, or to the beauty and gaiety of his person. He touched the heart of the queen consort, and, Buckingham perceiving it, became amorous of her in his turn. He was beset with Richelieu's spies, who gave him information of all that passed, and it is more than probable, that he informed Lewis of the intrigue. Buckingham saw that he was watched, and from thenceforth conceived an implacable hatred to Richelieu; but that did not cure his passion for the queen. He was as much above dissimulation as Richelieu was, and at very little pains to hide his resentment, which induced Richelieu to conceive a mutual hatred for him. The court conducted the new married queen as far as Amiens, in her way to England, and she proceeded to Boulogne, from whence Buckingham returned to Amiens, where he had a private interview with the queen, in which he was interrupted, and it is said, he was in danger of being assassinated; but we now return to the internal affairs of France.

Upon the removal of Vieuville, Marillac was placed at the head of the finances, to which Richelieu paid the greatest attention. He then proceeded in his great plan; for he sent the marquis de Cœuvres, as the French ambassador extraordinary to the Grisons, and he expelled from the Val-teline, the pope's troops, who had held it for some time, by way of deposit. The Spaniards, as well as the court of Rome, complained bitterly of this proceeding; but Richelieu despised the menaces of both, and proceeded in the execution of his plan, and the advancement of his own power, to which the state of the French court was very favourable. Lewis was naturally peevish, and neither loved nor esteemed his queen. He was dissatisfied with his brother, ther, the duke of Orleans, who had a strong party at court; and their dissensions made way for the greatness of the cardinal, who was courted on all hands.

The ruin of the protestants being resolved upon by Richelieu, a garrison was placed in Montpellier, and fort Lewis was erected to bridle Rochelle, both against the terms of the late treaty. The cardinal, not contented with this, ordered a squadron of ships to be equipped, at Blivet, to block up Rochelle. This squadron was seized by Soubise, and carried off, all but two ships, which foundered. The French historians pretend that he did this even without the concurrence of his party; but the sequel shewed him to be well founded in his suspicion. It is certain, from the duke of Rohan's own memoirs, that while Soubise was employed in this dangerous and difficult service, and when by some reports it was thought that he had miscarried in it, his undertaking was disowned by the general body of the French hugonots; nor does it clearly appear by the duke of Rohan's account, that he had sufficient grounds for again resuming his arms, which he did with great vigour.

The English assist
the French.

The war with the protestants being renewed, Richelieu demanded the assistance of the English squadron, which was then at sea, under vice admiral Pennington, to reduce Rochelle; and Charles was weak enough to order Pennington to deliver up his ships to the duke of Montmorenci, who was to command the siege. Pennington, with great reluctance complied, and he and all the English returned home, leaving their ships in the hands of the French, rather than serve against the protestants. This was one of the blackest steps of the reign of Charles, and so unpopular, that even Buckingham thought fit to disown it, and to commend Pennington's spirit. All that can be said in excuse for Charles, is, that the Dutch lent Montmorenci their ships, at the same time, and by their assistance he reduced the island of Rhe, and Oleron, and beat the fleet of Rochelle, which he blocked up. The murmurs of the English nation, at this proceeding gave a new turn to the politics of Charles, and his minister, which was forwarded by the infidelity of the French court, who postponed all their engagements with England, to Richelieu's plan of reducing Rochelle. Charles met with some difficulty when he reclaimed his ships, which provoked him so much, that he insisted by his ambassadors, the earl of Holland, and Sir Dudley Carleton, upon Lewis giving satisfaction to his reformed subjects, which he accordingly did, by granting them a new peace, of which the king of England was the guarantee; and by it the protestants, obtained the demolition of fort Lewis.

War in Italy.

The duke of Savoy was the principal of the war carried on seemingly, against the Genoese in Italy; but the French and Spaniards had the greatest interest in its success. The former acted as auxiliaries to the duke, and the latter to the Genoese. The constable, and his son, the marshal de Crequi, beat the Spaniards in Italy, and raised the siege of Verrue; and, at last each court ordered the ships and effects of the subjects of the other to be seized in its dominions. A treaty was set on foot at Moncon, under the pope's mediation, and the Spaniards were excluded from the Valteline, which was restored to the Grisons. Richelieu disregarded all the cutting reflections that were thrown out by the allies of France against this peace; but he obtained a marshal's baton for the count of Schomberg, one of the ablest and worthiest men in France.
the

Great pains had been taken by Lewis, and his ministers, History of to spoil the education of his brother, the duke of Orleans, the duke who is said to have been naturally of a generous and ami- of Orleans able disposition. He fell, at last, into the hands of Ornano, who improved him in all the bad habits he had acquired under his former governors. He prevailed with his pupil; when but sixteen years of age, to demand a seat at the council-board, for which Vieuville had sent Ornano to the Bastile; but he was delivered by Richelieu. Ornano knew the importance of a king's only brother in the French government; and he persuaded him to put himself at the head of a party against Richelieu. The dutchess of Montpensier, the richest heiress in France, had long been destined to the duke of Orleans in marriage; but the match was opposed by the queen-consort, and the abbot Scaglia, ambassador from the duke of Savoy, who was disgusted with the peace of Moncon, and offered the duke the princess of Mantua, his grand-daughter, in marriage. Lewis, at that time, had a private favourite, one Barradas, who persuaded him that a scheme had been formed for shaving him, and shutting him up in a convent, and for obtaining from the pope a dispensation for his brother to marry the queen. This made such an impression upon Lewis, that he gave Ornano a marshal's baton, upon his engaging to dispose the duke to marry the princess of Montpensier. The baton did not prevent Ornano, together with the abbot Scaglia, from forming very dangerous designs against Richelieu; and it is said, they drew the king's master of the robes, the count de Chalais, into a plot, to murder him, while he was hunting. It is uncertain, whether this plot was real or invented by the cardinal to ruin Chalais, who lost his head, and Ornano, who died in the Bastile. There is strong reason for believing that the whole was a fiction, for Chalais was tried by the extraordinary commission, the members of which were named by Richelieu, who had guards assigned him, to preserve him from the like attempts for the future.

The cardinal was in love with the dutchess of Chevreuse, the widow of Luynes, but she retired to Lorraine, where she joined with the Spanish faction, in all their intrigues. Scaglia went over to England, and was so successful with Buckingham, that Charles dismissed all his queen's servants who had been put about her, either by the cardinal, or the queen-mother, and declared, that, as guarantee of the treaty of Montpellier, he was resolved to see justice done to the French hugonots. The latter, this year, lost a friend by the death of the constable, Lefdiguieres; for though he had forsaken their communion, yet he still continued to be a warm advocate for moderation, and did them very important services at court. Upon his death, Richelieu prevailed with the king to suppress, by an edict, the office of constable, and to buy from Montmorenci, that of admiral, as being posts that gave too much power to a subject. As there was a necessity, however, for reviving the maritime power of France, in order to reduce Rochelle, Richelieu was declared superintendant of the marine, an office, that, without the title, gave him all the power, of admiral. Nothing could now withstand his credit with Lewis. He procured the disgrace even of the king's favourite Barradas, who was succeeded by one St. Simon, a creature of his own. He then struck into a kind of mean between the Spanish and the hugonot interest, and flattered each with the hope of crushing the other. He softened the duke of Savoy's resentment against Spain; and the hugonots seeing that he encouraged the German protestants, were so much persuaded that he meant them well, that they suffered him to fortify the isle of Oleron, near Rochelle, and to bridle Montpensier with a citadel.

The ruin of Rochelle resolved
on.

Soubise, after his defeat at the isle of Rhe, had taken refuge in England, where he met with a warm friend in the minister, whom for obvious reasons, Lewis had refused to receive as an ambassador from Charles. Soubise corresponded with his brother, the duke of Roban; and the violent aversion which Buckingham had now conceived against Richelieu, led him to promise, that three descents should be made upon France, one upon the isle of Rhe, another upon Gascony, and the third in Normandy, while the English fleet was to block up the Loire, the Seine, and the Garonne. No fewer than thirty thousand men were destined to be sent upon this expedition; and upon their landing in France, the duke of Roban was to have joined them at the head of the protestants. That duke, however, had too good intelligence of what was passing in England to believe that this plan was practicable; but he saw that there was a deep laid design formed by the cardinal to ruin Rochelle. In this Richelieu was so firm, that he even concluded a peace with Spain against England, and Buckingham laid hold of that circumstance to attempt to become popular in his own country, by forming closer connections than ever with the heads of the French hugonots.

Marriage
of the duke of Orleans.

Lewis had carried his point in bringing about a marriage between his brother and the princess of Montpensier; a lady so well disposed and prudent, that, during her life-time, a perfect harmony reigned in the royal family; but dying in child-bed, child-bed, of a daughter, fresh intrigues ensued. The Spanish faction knew from Richelieu's connections with the Dutch, that the peace he had made with his Catholic majesty, was merely a measure of conveniency, and they joined with a great party in the French court, who were enemies to the cardinal, to dispose the duke of Orleans to renew his intrigues. Had the court of England been upon better terms with the people than it was at this time, the consequence might have been fatal to France; for a declaration of war was published at London, against France, because its court was under the influence of the house of Austria, and because Lewis had not only violated his treaty with the protestants, of which Charles was guarantee; but had seized an hundred and twenty English ships, with their cargoes and artillery. The French court pleaded the infraction of the treaty of marriage between Charles and his queen, and the haughtiness and aversion of Buckingham, to give their ambassador, Bassompierre, any satisfaction on that, and many other complaints. It must be owned, that those were frivolous pretexts on the part of France; and it is amazing that Buckingham, notwithstanding his unpopularity, could fit out a fleet of ninety ships of war, besides transports, of which he was declared admiral, for the relief of Rochelle, which was now threatened to be besieged, by sea and land.

The conduct of the duke of Rohan, and his brother, the Buckingham duke of Soubise, upon this occasion, seems to have been somewhat irregular. They had entered into engagements with Buckingham in the name of all the French hugonots; but it soon appeared that two factions existed in Rochelle itself, one in favour of the French court, who pretended, that the English, if admitted into Rochelle, would keep it for themselves; the other party was headed by the duke of Rohan's mother and wife, who had taken refuge there; but we do not find, though Charles was guarantee of the late treaty between Lewis and his protestant subjects, that any regular application was made to him by the body of the latter. Be that as it will, it is certain, that Buckingham appeared with the English fleet before Rochelle, on the twentieth of July 1627; but the gates of the town were shut upon him, through the prevalency of the court party. The mayor was in that interest, and it was with the utmost difficulty that Soubise, and Sir William Beecher, Buckingham's confident, gained admittance into the place. They harangued the Rochellers, and exhorted them to stand on their own defence, as the king of England was resolved to defend them. All the answer they obtained was, that they could do nothing without the concurrence of the other French protestants. This unexpected conduct exasperated the English, and the duke of Buckingham, who, contrary to his agreement with Soubise, had made a descent upon the isle of Rhe, where they beat the French general, Thoiras, but unaccountably neglected to pursue their advantage. Richelieu did not fail to improve this invasion of the English. All former animosities among the courtiers were forgot, and their preparations to march against their enemies were so general, that Lewis was heard to say, “Am I then to be left alone?” Never was an expedition worse conducted than this was, on the part of the English. Their being denied admittance into Rochelle, soured them even to inactivity. They considered the hugonots as equally their enemies with the catholics; and though Buckingham at last besieged fort Martin, where Thoiras commanded, yet he neglected all precautions for preventing supplies being thrown into the place, and suffered himself to be amused by negotiation.

Cardinal Richelieu, in the mean while, ordered quarters to be marked out in the neighbourhood of Rochelle, for twenty-five thousand men; and in October, the French king, with the prime of his nobility, and a royal army, formed the siege of Rochelle. The duke of Roban was again declared a traitor by the parliament, and condemned to be torn in pieces by horses; but he continued his operations with great spirit, in Guienne, till he understood from England, that no descent was to be made on that part of France. Buckingham carried on the siege of fort Martin, more from obstinacy, because he had begun it, than from any other principle, but was unfortunate in every motion he made, though Soubise had now prevailed with the Rochellers to declare themselves in favour of England. Supplies were daily thrown into the fort, and the English were insulted by their enemies holding up, by way of bravade, upon the points of their pikes, fowl, mutton, bread, and other provisions, as signals of their being relieved. Buckingham pretended his army was on the point of a mutiny, and after meeting with frequent repulses from the fort, notwithstanding his being reinforced, he called a council of war, in which it was resolved that his fleet and army should return to England. Soubise prevailed upon him to postpone this resolution for a few days, because the earl of Holland was daily expected with a fresh reinforcement; but, in the mean while, marshal Schomberg, arrived in the island, with an army superior to that of the English. Buckingham proposed to fight him; but the English officers and folders were so damped by his blundering conduct, that when they began their march, their advanced guards were beaten, and they were obliged to recover their trenches. The same fate attended a final, but an obstinate, attempt which he made to storm the fort, where he was repulsed with the loss of six hundred and fifty men. On the eighth of November, Buckingham began his march towards his own ships, but lost above a thousand of his men by the attacks of the French under

under Schomberg; notwithstanding the natural intrepidity of his troops. The whole loss of the English in this expedition, amounted to above four thousand men. The Rochellers sent deputies to complain to Charles of Buckingham's conduct, which had encreased their miseries; but they could obtain no redress, through the prevailing interest of the favourite.

Richelieu, now staked not only his administration, but his head, upon the reduction of Rochelle. Though the winter was far advanced, he prevailed with the king, notwithstanding the delicacy of his constitution, and his being but lately recovered from a dangerous illness, to remain in the camp, which induced almost all the nobility, and general officers, in France, to attend him. Guillon was then mayor of Rochelle, and at the head of a brave, determined people, but under excessive discouragements. Not only the court, but the French nation in general were exasperated against them, for their connections with the English, who, they said, wanted to reconquer France. Even the protestant powers upon the continent beheld them with an unfavourable eye, because it was known that they were supported by the Spaniards, as well as the English. The duke of Rohan was then carrying on a war in Languedoc against the prince of Conde, and the duke of Montmorenci, so that the Rochellers had only their own courage, and England, to depend upon; because Richelieu had employed the argument of religion to so much advantage, and had so artfully improved the differences between Spain and England, that they were entirely abandoned by his Catholic majesty.

We have, in the course of this work, more than once mentioned, the determined spirit which the ancestors of the Rochellers had often manifested in defending their privileges, and it seemed now to be drawn into one point in their posterity. Guillon, before he undertook his office, holding up a poniard in his hand, “I accept (said he to his fellow citizens) my office, with this declaration, that I am resolved to strike this dagger into the heart of the first man who shall advise a surrender; and may I be served in the same manner, if ever I admit of a capitulation.” It is incredible to what a pitch of power the Rochellers, at this time, had raised themselves. Their city was strong, their marine very considerable, and they proposed the republic of Holland as the model of their government; but under the protection of the French king. When the siege was first formed, the duke of Orleans had the command of the army, but he quitted it, upon the king's arrival in the camp, and the cardinal, in fact, was general; the duke of Angoulesme, and the marshals Bassompierre, and Schomberg, acting under him. A fleet of Spanish ships arrived before the port, under don Frederic de Toledo; but, according to Voltaire, he returned with his ships, without entering upon any operation, because Lewis would not suffer him to be covered in his presence. The same author seems inclinable to believe, that the cardinal privately prevailed on the French queen-consort to write a letter to Buckingham, which delayed his preparations.

It is certain, that, in May 1628, the earl of Denbigh was sent from England with a fleet of ten ships of the line, and sixty smaller ships, which appeared before Rochelle; but all the entreaties of the duke of Soubise, and the deputies from that city, could not prevail upon him to act offensively; and he returned with great disgrace to Portsmouth. Some historians have insinuated, that Charles was not in earnest; but nothing can be worse grounded than such a surmise. He was so sincere in his intentions to relieve the Rochellers, that he interlined, with his own hand, the only clause in Denbigh's instructions, authorizing him to act offensively; and upon the return of his fleet, he wrote the two following letters to the Rochellers;

“ GENTLEMEN,

Letters of king Charles to them.

“ BE not discomfited though my fleet be returned; hold out to the last; for I am resolved, that all my fleet shall perish, rather than you shall not be relieved; and to this end I have countermanded it; and have sent ships to make them change their design, that they had taken to come back. I shall shortly send you some number of ships to reinforce it; and with the help of God, the success will be happy for your deliverance.

Your good Friend,

“ GENTLEMEN,

“ I have been troubled to hear, that my fleet was upon the point of returning without answering my commands, which were to force the entry of your provisions whatever came of it; and have given it new orders to return into your road; and not stir till it has relieved you with victuals, or that I have sent them an additional strength, for which I have caused men to work with all diligence. Be assured, that I will never abandon you, and that I will employ all the force of my kingdom for your deliverance, until it please God to bless me with giving you an assured peace.

Gentlemen,

Your good Friend,

To make his promises good an order was sent to the earl of Denbigh to return to the relief of Rochelle; but the duke of Buckingham reserved that honour to himself, because it was

was the readiest way, if successful, to retrieve his popularity in England. As he was about to embark, he was stabbed by Felton; but the particulars of his murder do not belong to this part of our history.

Richelieu, in reducing Rochelle, discovered a genius equal Progress to that of an Alexander, and a Julius Cæsar. He had read of the of the vast works raised by the one against Tyre, the situa- siege. tion of which was pretty similar to that of Rochelle, and of the other at Durazzo. He obtained a general's commission from Lewis, and when vested with a military command, he resolved to rival the fame of those heroes, by erecting a mole of seven thousand and four hundred feet in length, into the sea. The waves demolished it, as well as a barricade, which had been invented by Pompeio Targoni, an Italian engineer. Richelieu was superior to all misfortunes that perseverance could conquer; and two Frenchmen, Lewis Metezeau, and John Tiriot, undertook to construct the dyke that was to block up the harbour of Rochelle. This was complicated by most amazing labour. A strong fort was erected at each extremity of this dyke; the construction of which lasted between the second of December, and the May following. The king returned to Paris; and all the officers of the army had orders from him to obey the cardinal, as if his majesty was present in person. He could not have employed a better general, for Richelieu pawned even his own jewels to pay the troops; who were so well fed and lodged that they scarcely felt the inconveniencies of a winter campaign. Not contented with that, he raised a considerable fleet, though the marine of France was then in the most despicable condition. The murder of the duke of Buckingham did not damp the zeal of Charles, which was fervent and sincere for the relief of Rochelle, and the maritime preparations went on more briskly than they had done during the life-time of that favourite. The earl of Lindsey was appointed to command the fleet; but by this time, the Rochellers had lost ten thousand of their best men. When Charles took leave of the earl, he desired him to be guided in all his undertakings by the duke of Soubise, who was then in England.

On the eighteenth of September the fleet sailed, and a furious cannonading commenced between it and that of the French, but without great detriment on either side. This proved fatal to the Rochellers; for most of the English sea officers having been appointed by Buckingham, upon parliamentary, or court interest, they were void of all experience and knowledge of their business. They rejected, in a council of war, all proposals made by Soubise for forcing the dyke. Another proposal made by count Laval for demolishing it by an artificial mine, met with the same fate; and Soubise had certain intelligence that the place, if not surrenders

relieved, was on the point of surrendering, through the extreme famine which the inhabitants suffered. Accordingly, on the last day of October, Rochelle was given up to the king, and his cardinal general. The inhabitants were permitted to enjoy the exercise of their religion, and they were secured in their estates; but their privileges, which had been so long formidable to the crown, were abolished. Not above four thousand of twenty thousand inhabitants, which the town contained, when the siege was formed, were left alive, and those were so emaciated, that they appeared like spectres, not a hundred of them having strength to do duty. Next day, after the surrender, the king made his triumphal entry, and that same, and a few following days, most of the dyke was demolished by the winds and the waves. This siege cost about forty millions of livres; but the place was taken without much effusion of blood, on the part of the besiegers.

The affairs of Italy.

We have already mentioned the disputes that arose concerning the succession to Mantua at this period. It is certain, that Richelieu encouraged Lewis to support the duke of Nevers in his claim upon that dutchy, and the rather, because the duke being a native of France, had been objected to on that account by the emperor, who had given the investiture of it to the duke of Guaftalla. A strong party was made at court against Lewis concerning himself in this affair; but as it related to the humbling of the house of Austria, the cardinal carried all before him. Lewis, accordingly, in the middle of February, set out at the head of his army, passed the Alps, in the midst of frost and snow. took the town and castle of Susa, and daunted the duke of Savoy; so that he consented to grant the French troops a passage through his dominions, and to prevail upon the Spaniards to raise the siege of Casal. This accommodation was followed by a treaty for preserving the peace of Italy; in which Lewis, the republic of Venice, and the duke of Savoy, were parties. The Venetians, at the same time, negotiated and concluded another treaty between Lewis and Charles I. of England. This was a most amazing expedition, for the cardinal fought and treated at the same time, with equal vigour; and Lewis returned triumphantly to his capital. The court of Spain endeavoured to ballance the progress of his, or rather his cardinal's, arms, by liberally supporting the duke of Rohan, who was still at the head of a strong party, and in possession of many important places. Though his catholic majesty was still at peace with France, yet he consented to pay the duke an annual subsidy of three hundred thousand dollars, for keeping up his troops, and for enabling him to form an independent state, or republic, of protestants within France, with a toleration, however, of the Roman catholic religion in in the protestant towns and countries. In May, the king besieged Privas, which was in the hands of the protestants, and took it, after a strong resistance; but ordered the garrison to be hanged before his eyes. This severity struck such a terror into the people of Aletz, that they surrendered, notwithstanding all that the duke of Rohan could do, to encourage them to defend themselves, and obtained a good capitulation; which was inviolably preserved, through the mediation of the cardinal, who apologized for the cruelties at Privas, because he was sick in bed when they were committed. The cardinal, by this time, had given unquestionable proofs of his military capacity; and he behaved with a frankness towards the protestants, that encouraged the dukes of Rohan, and Soubise, to treat with him.

The former found that his treaty with the crown of Spain was delusive and ineffectual; and the cardinal fairly told him, that, if he omitted the opportunity of making his peace after the reduction of Aletz, he and his whole party were to expect no terms. The duke resolved to listen to his admonition; and though he had been declared a rebel, he treated with his sovereign as an independent prince. He obtained for his party the continuance and confirmation of their privileges; but they gave up all their cautionary towns; which indeed must have been the sources of perpetual war. The two dukes preserved their estates and honours, and the duke of Rohan received a hundred thousand crowns, on condition of his retiring to Venice for a certain time, to humour Lewis, who insisted on that condition. The king was now returned to Paris; but Richelieu went to Montauban, where he behaved with great frankness and politeness to the protestants; and he paid them for demolishing their own fortifications. Thus Richelieu, being determined to carry war into the neighbouring states, re-established peace at home, to make the success of his arms more effectual.

The queen-mother had opposed the Italian expedition in favour of the duke of Mantua, because she intended a marriage between a princess of the house of Medici and her son the duke of Orleans, who was desperately in love with the duke of Nevers's daughter. The duke of Nevers, whom we now call duke of Mantua, had orders to withdraw his daughter out of France; but this was so violently opposed by her lover, that the queen-mother, who was regent during her son's absence in Italy, had put the princess, and her aunt, the dutchess of Longueville, under a very rough arrest. The duke of Orleans retired, upon this, in a sullen fit, to Joinville; and the king, upon his return from Italy, treated his discontent with vast disregard; though, at the same time, he disapproved of the indelicacy of his mother with regard to the princess Gonzagua. This split the court into parties, parties, which ran high at the time of Richelieu's return from Mantua to Paris. The queen-mother had not the least idea of his daring to differ with her; but, when she found that he approved of the king's resentment, she publicly treated him as an ungrateful wretch, and the creature of her own power, threatening to humble him, as she had raised him. The cardinal was, at the same time, attacked by a manifesto from the duke of Orleans, who was then at Nijmes, and who loaded him with the most opprobrious and injurious accusations. Richelieu offered to resign his places; but Lewis, instead of accepting them, declared him, by patents, first his prime-minister, and then generalissimo of his armies; which, at that time, were preparing to march once more against the duke of Savoy.

Great
promotion of Richelieu.

That prince, depending upon the treaty between the protestants and the court of Madrid, had joined the Spaniards, and renewed the siege of Casal, with an intention to crush the duke of Mantua, while the arms of Lewis were employed against his protestant subjects. Richelieu was now in the zenith of his power: by his letters patent, which were written by the king's own hand, he could treat with ambassadors, and conclude alliances, without his master's participation; and, in his military capacity, the marshals Cregui, de la Force, Bassompierre, and Schomberg, served under him, at the head of an army of twenty thousand foot and three thousand horse. He had the privilege of being attended by body-guards, and his exterior appearance was rather more magnificent than that of the king. His progress was rapid; for, in the month of February, after disregarding all invitations to an interview with the prince of Piedmont, he marched to Susa, and had almost surprised the person of the duke of Savoy at Rivoli. The duke escaped to Turin, which the cardinal made a feint of investing; but, all of a sudden, he besieged and took Pignerole; which completed the cardinal's scheme of opening a passage for the French from Dauphiny into Italy, and dashed in pieces all the precautions and intrigues of his enemies, both foreign and domestic. By taking Pignerole, he became, in a manner, master of the dukedom of Savoy; Chamberri being reduced much about the same time. Lewis and his court set out for Savoy, which, all but the fortress of Montmelian, was entirely reduced. Casal, likewise, still held out; and the duke of Mantua was prisoner in the hands of the imperialists.

His alliance with Gustavus
Adolphus.

Richelieu's enemies laid hold of those circumstances to attempt to shake his credit with his master; but they were ignorant of the depth of his policy. He had supported the king of Denmark with money, and had formed secret connections with the duke of Bavaria, the elector of Triers, and other great members of the diet of Ratisbon; and, by this time, he had engaged the famous Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, in the vast designs which he afterwards carried into execution against the house of Austria. Casal continued still still besieged, and the relieving it was found to be next to impracticable, when the pope sent his nephew, cardinal Barberini, and Mazarine, afterwards the famous cardinal of that name, to negotiate with Richelieu at Pignerole. A number of fortunate events for Richelieu now happened, which delivered him from his perplexities.

His party was so strong at the diet of Ratisbon, that the emperor was, in a manner, forced to promise the investiture of Mantua to the French duke. The duke of Montmorenci beat the conjoined armies of imperialists, Spaniards, and Savoyards, at Vegliana. The duke of Savoy died, by which the Spaniards lost their firmest ally. Diffensions arose between the Germans and the Spaniards; and the marshals de la Force, Schomberg, and Marillac, undertook the relief of Casal; while Richelieu attended the king, who was dangerously ill, to Lyons, to watch the motions of his enemies at court. The siege of Casal had been so vigorously pressed, that, by the agency of Mazarine, a suspension of arms was agreed on; but Casal was to be surrendered to the Spaniards if not relieved by the middle of October. The Spaniards insisted upon the latter condition being complied with, notwithstanding the stipulations of the treaty of Ratisbon; and it was owing to the indefatigable interposition of Mazarine (who, in mediating between the two armies, exposed himself to the shot of both) that an accommodation took place; by which Casal remained with the French; and Thoiras, who had so bravely defended it, obtained a marshal's baton.

Lewis, by this time, was given over by his physicians at Danger-Lyons. The cardinal found the party of his enemies, at this illness the head of which were the two queens, every day gaining of Lewis, strength; and that measures were taken to cut off his flight and his to Brouage, of which he was governor, when the king re- friendship covered. He had, during his illness, which was an impost- for Richelieu friendship for Richelieu, and had engaged the duke of Montmorenci to protect him. Even the recovery of Lewis seemed to be ineffectual for that purpose, so powerful was the faction against him, many of its members being composed of persons who owed their advancement to himself, and the marshal Marillac among others. Richelieu was determined to spare none of his enemies whom his vengeance could reach; but the two queens, the duke of Orleans, and the Spanish ambassador, were above it; and they represented the cardinal's haughtiness and ambition in such terms as, sometimes, seemed to affect the king's friendship for him; but no sooner did he obtain an audience, than he regained it by enlarging upon the ruinous connections between the queen-mother and the Spanish faction, and the evident insufficiency of all her party for the support of government; which, if left to them, them, must fall so heavy upon the king as inevitably to crush him.

whom he sacrifices to his mother's
tears ;

Jealousy, and a distrust of himself, operated on Lewis, equally against the cardinal as against his mother ; but his natural inconstancy was, at last, fixed by Richelieu's arts. Haughty as he was, upon the king's return to Paris, he consented to ask the queen-mother's pardon on his knees ; and, that his favourite niece, madam de Combalet, who was particularly obnoxious to her majesty, should do the same. It is even said, with the greatest appearance of probability, that Lewis agreed to sacrifice Richelieu to the tears of his mother ; and that he turned his back upon that minister when he entered the room where they were consulting. His submissions, and those of his niece, to the queen-mother, served only to render her more intractable and vindictive towards both ; and the cardinal was preparing to surrender all his power and places, when the king suddenly retired to Versailles, then a small hunting seat ; leaving his mother, who resided at the palace of Luxembourg, to all appearance, in possession of the government.

Her vanity in receiving the compliments of the courtiers on this happy turn of her affairs, instead of accompanying her son to his retirement, undid her. Though a woman of strong passions, and of a generous disposition, she was no better than the dupe of her favourites ; at the head of whom were her physician, Vautier ; the keeper of the seals ; and his brother, the marshal Marillac ; with some ladies of high distinction and great intrigue. The countess of Fargis, one of the most beautiful, as she was the most artful, woman in France, directed her conduct ; and the duke of Orleans was governed by those who could best flatter his resentments and passions. The resolutions of a party composed of so many different members, could not be long a secret ; and, when they had resolved upon the part which each was to act in the ruin of the cardinal, and their several shares in the distribution of his spoils, the whole was carried to St. Simon, the king's private favourite ; who laid them before his master, and did not fail to enforce the discovery with arguments drawn from the queen-mother's growing partiality for her second son, and her vindictive temper, which had not yet suffered her to forget the assassination of d'Ancre.

but he is
saved.

All the natural diffidence and suspicion of Lewis now took a different turn. He heard, with horror, what was, perhaps, but too true ; that his mother had consulted with astrologers to know the duration of his life, which was the only bar to her favourite son's mounting the throne. He sent for Richelieu, restored him to a double share of his favour and protection, and sealed the ruin of his enemies ; while the queen-mother was receiving the compliments of the nobility and her dependents upon the disgrace of the cardinal cardinal and his party. She was undeceived by the sudden desertion of all the votaries to her recovered greatness. Vautier, her favourite physician, was, that very day, sent to the bastile. The marshal Marillac was put under arrest by the marshals de la Force and Schomberg, at the head of that very army which he expected to command. His brother, the keeper of the seals, was sent prisoner to Chateaudun, where he died of grief. The countess de Fargis was forbid the court in a very coarse manner; nor was there one of that cabal who, but a few hours before, had promised to themselves the spoils of the French government, that did not suffer either disgrace or imprisonment.

But, though this revolution in the French administration Defence appears, at first, to have been brought about by private and of Lewis personal motives, yet it was, perhaps, a wise and a solid one that re-measure in Lewis, with regard to that dignity of his crown revolution. which he wanted to establish. He was naturally an enthusiast for the greatness of France, which had been planned by Richelieu with wonderful art and address; but he alone could carry it into execution. He had formed connections for reducing the Austrian power in Italy and the Low Countries; and he had a prospect of reducing it in Germany by means of Gustavus Adolphus, and the protestant princes there, to its original state under a count of Hapsburg. Luckily for him, Gustavus Adolphus had many quarrels with the emperor of Germany, independent of his alliance with France; so that Richelieu did little more than enable him, by an annual subsidy of four hundred thousand crowns, to re-establish the liberties of the Germanic body and the interests of the protestant religion, which were on the point of expiring under Austrian tyranny and bigotry. In Italy, Richelieu, by the agency of Mazarine, made a private treaty with the duke of Savoy, who yielded up to France Pignerole, for ever, on his being promised an indemnification out of the duke of Mantua's estates.

In the middle of April, the public treaty of Querasque was made between the Spaniards and the duke of Savoy, who obtained by it no more than had been already stipulated for him by the private treaty. In short, Richelieu, by his intrepidity, and Mazarine, by his intrigues, broke the Spanish power in Italy, and formed a strong barrier to the independency of her princes. It would be absurd to suppose that Lewis was insensible of the cardinal's merits, in those mighty works; and that even motives of ambition might have effected the sudden reverse, which now took place in his government. We are not, however, to dissemble that every thing was managed about his court upon the meanest and most interested principles; and that it is probable the revolution never would have taken place, if Lewis had suffered himself to continue longer under the influence of the two queens and their favourites.

Richelieu,

Conduct
of the queen-
mother,

Richelieu, though the most bloody politician alive, did not chuse immediately to involve the queen-mother in the ruin of her creatures. He suffered her, upon her curbing her resentment with some appearance of decency, and even submission, to remain at Paris; but she soon closed in with the violence of the duke of Orleans, who was likewise too great for the cardinal to ruin; though it is said that the duke intended to have assassinated him in his own palace. The queen-mother became equally outrageous, and the king sent for her to Compeigne; where finding her inexorable to any reconciliation with the minister, he left her a prisoner; but she again made her escape, and went to Brussels; while the duke of Orleans took refuge in Lorraine, and entered into a contract of marriage with the princess Margaret, that duke's sister. This was a delicate point; and, though Lewis did not pretend to question the validity of the marriage, yet, even after it was consummated, he insisted upon its being dissolved, because the apparent heir of his crown could not, as he alledged, by the laws and constitution of France, contract or consummate a marriage without his knowledge or consent.

whose favourites
are |disgraced,

Finding that this had no effect on the duke of Lorraine, an extraordinary court of justice was erected, who proceeded in a very severe manner against the cardinal's enemies. Marshal Bassompierre was sent prisoner to the bastile, only because he had more wit than the cardinal, and because he was an admirer of the princess of Conti, who was sent into exile, together with the dutchesses of Elbeuf and Lefdiguières, madam de Ornans, and others of the same party. This had no effect upon the duke of Orleans, who always sacrificed his friends to his own caprice and safety; and he sent a new manifesto to the parliament of Paris, accusing Richelieu of being the instrument of his, and the nation's, ruin; and exhibiting himself, as it were, before that body, as his accuser.

The new court of justice continued its proceedings; and the duke of Rouannes, the countess of Fargis, and other persons of great distinction of both sexes, were executed in effigy, because they were not within their reach to put them to death. The queen-mother, in her turn, applied to the parliament for justice against the cardinal; which she did in an injudicious manner, by making his crimes too personal towards her, and mingling falsehood with truth. All those shafts aimed at the cardinal served only to raise him in his master's esteem; for he now erected the lordship of Richelieu, with many other noble estates, into a duchy; which, after the cardinal's death, was to descend to his heirs general, either male or female.

and punished.

The reception of the duke of Orleans by the duke of Lorraine, continued to give so much uneasiness to Lewis, that he advanced towards that country with an army, and forced the
the

the duke at St. Vie, to agree to send his brother, and all the discontented Frenchmen, out of his dominions. No sooner was Lewis on his return from Lorraine, than that duke entered into intrigues with some German princes for an invasion of France; but this was prevented by the king and his minister threatening to invest Nanci; which forced the duke again to buy his peace by the perpetual surrender of Clermont to France, and that of Stenai and Janets for four years. The cardinal was now at such a pitch of greatness, by having lately obtained the government of Bretagne, that the queen-mother and her party charged him with designs upon the crown itself. To shew how little he regarded their enmity, he carried on a process against marshal Marillac with a degree of rancour and injustice till then unknown in France. He appointed a commission of his own creatures to try him; but they, obsequious as they were to his will, could not find him guilty, till Richelieu, with all the circumstances of barbarity, carried him to his own country-house; where his enemy, Chateauneuf, who had succeeded Marillac's brother as keeper of the seals, sat as president of the court; which, against all kind of evidence, condemned him to death; and he suffered the sentence, after discharging forty years service to that crown.

The duke of Orleans, in consequence of the late treaty The duke with the duke of Lorraine, was now a vagabond; and his of Orleans cause was given up as desperate by all persons of great distinction, excepting the marshal-duke of Montmorenci, who Burgundy had unadvisedly, but generously, promised to support him against the cardinal. The prince had put himself at the head of about fifteen hundred, or two thousand, horse and foot he had collected in France and the neighbouring states; but most miserably provided in arms and necessaries. With them he made an irruption into Burgundy, where he proclaimed cardinal Richelieu a traitor to the king and the public.

Richelieu was under great difficulties on this occasion, Character especially after he found that the duke had penetrated into of father Languedoc, Montmorenci's government, and was received by Joseph. him at the head of about eight thousand men. The marshals de la Force and Schomberg were appointed to act against the rebels; but both they and the other generals expressed a visible reluctance to take upon them the command against the apparent heir of the crown. Richelieu applied, on this occasion, to his trusty friend and confidant, one father Joseph, a capuchin; who, under the most mortifying appearances, united the most dextrous management of business to the wildest flights of enthusiasm. Though he made no public figure at court, and though his name is hardly mentioned in the general histories of those times, yet it is certain that he assisted the cardinal's head, and influenced his master's conscience. Richelieu esteemed and consulted him, and always ways gave him hopes of procuring for him a cardinal's hat; which he might easily have obtained, had he not been jealous of the capuchin's abilities, and afraid of losing his services. It was this father Joseph who, when Richelieu thought it indecent for him to give his advice on so tender a point, had determined Lewis to put his mother under an arrest at Compeigne. He was trusted by, and personally known to almost all, the great potentates and ministers in Europe, whom he had occasionally visited in disguise; and was a particular favourite with pope Urban by whose recommendation he had introduced Mazarine to Lewis and Richelieu.

The duke of Montmorenci Such was the man whom the cardinal employed to persuade his master not to trust any of his subjects with the command against his brother, and he succeeded. Both defeated, Lewis and his queen joined the army, attended by the cardinal and his trusty capuchin. Montmorenci having intelligence of his march, and knowing that marshal Schomberg lay at a small distance, with an army of observation of about four thousand men, in a strong camp at Castelnaudari, he resolved to surprize him. He accordingly attacked Schomberg's entrenchments, but in a very unsoldier-like manner, with his cavalry, without waiting for his infantry. At first, he bore down all before him; but, impelled either by liquor, resentment, or despair, or, perhaps, by all, he leaped a ditch, where he could be followed by not above a dozen of his attendants; and, after being wounded and beaten from his horse, he was made prisoner. This catastrophe happened in the fight of the duke of Orleans, and that part of Montmorenci's army which was not engaged. The infantry, upon seeing his fate, disbanded themselves; and the duke, with a body of horse, fled to Beziers.

The news of Montmorenci's defeat and captivity coming to court, various consultations were held about the future disposal of the duke, and the punishment of Montmorenci. The former, as usual, had written the most abject letters to Lewis; offering to regard Richelieu as his friend, but earnestly interceding for Montmorenci's pardon; which Bouillon, one of Richelieu's creatures, who was sent to treat with him, gave him hopes of obtaining from Lewis; but the cardinal and the capuchin painted Montmorenci's crimes in such colours, that Lewis was persuaded the greatest act of beneficence he could show for his people, and the tranquillity of the state, would be to punish his illustrious prisoner with death. His trial was accordingly ordered, and he was beheaded, at Tholouse, on the thirtieth of October, 1632.

He was the last of the Montmorenci family, which boasted of being the eldest race of nobles in France or Europe. He did honour to his ancestors by his virtues, and every accomplishment of mind and person; but he seems to have had a tincture of their romantic spirit. This appeared by his attacking Schomberg's entrenchments, not as a general, but a knight-knight-errant ; by his wearing in a bracelet a miniature picture of the queen-mother, with whom he was in love ; and by his bequeathing, at the time of his death, a fine picture of Carraccio to his capital enemy Richelieu. He behaved with as much manly firmness and resignation at his death, as he did with a noble gallantry and generosity in his life.

If the sentence executed upon Montmorenci is examined Farther by the maxims of strict justice, or sound policy, it will not, deliver- perhaps, be found irreconcilable to either ; as *Montmoren-*ance of ci's was an unprovoked rebellion, and must have given a Richelieu most dangerous precedent, had he been pardoned, to other great lords. Lewis, to shew he had not punished him from any personal motives, gave the forfeiture of his great estate to the prince of Conde, who, till then, had always been necessitous. While the court resided in Languedoc, the duke of Orleans obtained pardon for himself and his favourite the duke of Elbeuf, upon his engaging to look upon Richelieu, ever after, as his friend, and not to depart above a mile from the place of residence which should be assigned him.

The queen-mother, during this negotiation, made an attempt, by means of some ruffians in her service, to carry off madam de Combalet, the cardinal's niece, from Paris ; but it was discovered ; and the king, to express his high sense of the cardinal's merits, said, in a letter to the lady, " that, had she been carried into Flanders, he would have reclaimed her at the head of fifty thousand men."

Among the other articles stipulated by the duke of Orleans, whose restraint was soon taken off, he had agreed never to see his mother ; which offended her so much that she retired from Brussels, on hearing that the duke had leave to pay her a visit. About this time, Richelieu fell ill ; and some of the courtiers, at the head of whom was Chateauneuf, the keeper of the seals, caballed to succeed him. The cardinal recovered ; and, being informed that Chateauneuf had behaved with an indecent levity during his illness, he took from him the seals, which he gave to Puiseguir, president of the parliament, and sent Chateauneuf prisoner to Angoulesme.

The death of Gustavus Adolphus, which happened about Vol. IX. this time at the battle of Lutzen, would have disconcerted, p. 163. and perhaps ruined, any minister of less firmness and address Affair of than Richelieu ; but he immediately sent the marquis de Feu- the Swedes quières to negotiate a new treaty with the Swedish chancellor in Germa- Oxenstiern ; and it was agreed, that France should continue ny. her subsidy, while the Swedes continued to make war in Germany. The dreadful consequences of this agreement, with regard to the house of Austria, has been explained in other parts of this work. Richelieu was equally fortunate on the side of the Low Countries, where the family of Orange, supported by French money, had greatly weakened the Au- Strian power ; but no sooner did he apprehend that the credit of the prince of Orange became too powerful for his own, among the States General, than he endeavoured to supplant him and strip his family of the city of Orange. He failed in both, but he knew that the prince durst not resent the injury he intended him. Even the court of Rome did not dare to dispute Richelieu's commands, and appointed a commission for trying such of the French bishops as were accused of favouring Montmorenci's rebellion ; of whom three were acquitted and three deposed.

Breach between the queen-mother and Lewis. Richelieu's next step was to prevail with his master to break off all correspondence with the queen-mother, who now, more warmly than ever, solicited her return to court. His pretext was, that she had favoured her son's late irruption into Languedoc (which she denied) and that she kept his, meaning Richelieu's, enemies about her person. The parliament of Paris had made some difficulty in verifying the edicts against the friends of the queen-mother and the duke of Orleans. This had drawn upon them the indignation of the cardinal, and he reduced their deputies to ask pardon on their knees. There seemed to be no end of his resentments. After Chateauneuf had been sent prisoner to Angoulesme, his friend, the commander de Jars, was committed to the bastile, with several other persons of distinction, for no other reason but because of their being Chateauneuf's friends, and supposed to hold a correspondence with the queen-mother. Richelieu, ever terrible in his revenge, ordered the judges, though there was little or no evidence against them, to condemn the commander, who received a pardon when he came to the scaffold where he was to suffer. Richelieu, notwithstanding all his power and good fortune, found fresh matter of disquiet in every occurrence and in every corner. His nauseous, awkward, courtships, and his natural infirmities now growing upon him, exposed him to the ridicule of the public, his mistresses being generally of the queen-mother's party ; and the intrigues of the house of Lorraine, animated by the duke of Orleans, gave him farther uneasiness.

The duke of Rohan receives a command. Business alone gave him relief. He persuaded the king to establish a parliament at Metz ; by which he broke the dependence of the French subjects in Alsace upon the imperial chamber at Spire. He dashed in pieces the negotiations between the States General and the court of Brussels in the Low Countries ; and he appointed the duke of Rohan, though little better than an exile, to represent the person of Lewis among the Grisons, and to take the command of the French troops in the Valtelline, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the Spaniards against that step, and against the operations of the French troops, who, under pretence of assisting the bishop of Treves, were carrying on war in the heart of the empire. The cardinal made slight of all their complaints ;
and,

and, to conceal the private treaty already made with the duke of Savoy, he pretended that he purchased from that prince the town of Pignerole, which the Spaniards claimed upon the faith of the treaty of Querasque.

Lewis, in 1633, invaded Lorraine, to oblige that prince to Lewis stand by his treaties; to desist from giving assistance to the invades Austrian party; and to put into his hands the princess Lorraine. Margaret, wife to the duke of Orleans. The duke of Lorraine was unable to resist a French army, headed by its king; and sent his brother, the cardinal, to treat with Richelieu; but, in the mean time, the princess escaped to her husband in Flanders. Upon this, Lewis, who had, before the conferences, taken possession of St. Michael and Luneville, invested Nanci, which the duke was forced to deliver up; and thus Lewis became, in fact, master of all Lorraine. The duke, who was Charles IV. could not bear the chagrin which the performance of this treaty gave him, and resigned his dominions to his brother, the cardinal, who married his sister-in-law, though he had been engaged with Richelieu's niece. The new-married couple were put under arrest, and carried to Nanci; from whence they made their escape in disguise.

The great defeat of the Swedes at the battle of Nordlingen, ibid. and the assassination of Wallenstein, had almost destroyed the p. 167. cardinal's long laboured plan of humbling the house of Austria, which had been before shaken by a growing misunderstanding between the Swedes and the German protestants. He repaired all, for some time at least, by renewing his engagements with Oxensteirn; by advancing sums to the German protestants, whose armies were still in the field; and by ordering the marshal de la Force to advance to the relief of the Swedes.

It was farther agreed, that Phillipsbourg should be put into Affairs of the hands of the French; and, that, if Lewis should consent Germany. to declare war against the Austrians, to which he was much pressed by the protestants, he should receive Alsace as a deposit. Though it was the first of November before this treaty was concluded at Paris, yet de la Force, before the end of the year, drove the imperialists from before the castle of Heidelberg, and recovered the town. Thus, upon the whole, the defeat of the Swedes at the battle of Nordlingen, contributed to the greatness of France, as it forced them to be more dependent than ever upon that court.

The duke of Orleans still continued in the Spanish Low Reconcili- Countries; and the court of Madrid thought him so valuable ation be- an acquisition, that it actually engaged itself, by a treaty tween with him, to furnish that prince with fifteen thousand men, Lewis and to make an irruption into France, provided he kept himself his bro- wholly disengaged from his brother for two years and a ther. half. Richelieu, by accident, obtained a copy (most probably the original) of this treaty; and he proposed such terms to the duke, that, without the knowledge of his wife or mother, he repaired to the French court; where he was loaded with caresses, though the parliament and clergy of France had, some time before, declared, that the two dukes of Lorraine, having committed a rape upon his person, and forced him to marry their sister, the marriage was illegal and void. One of the conditions, however, of the reconciliation between the two brothers, was, that the marriage should be re-established; which it accordingly was.

The French losers in Germany,

In the beginning of the year 1634, the affairs of France in Germany had a very gloomy aspect. She lost Philipsbourg to the imperialists, which was attended by a train of other misfortunes to their allies the Swedes. The cardinal de la Valette, whose military turn had given him a high rank in the French armies, stepped in to Richelieu's assistance at this time. He undertook the direction of warlike affairs, as father Joseph did that of the finances; but it was now found necessary for Lewis to strike into the plan of measures which had been lately adopted, by becoming a principal in the war; and therefore a formal denunciation of it was made by a herald at arms sent to Brussels; and a league was concluded between Lewis and the Dutch for a partition of the Spanish provinces in the Low Countries, if the inhabitants did not immediately shake off their dependence upon the catholic king.

From the æra of this treaty, the apprehensions of Europe from the power of the house of Bourbon may be dated. Scarcely was it made, when the house of Orange and many of the Dutch patriots, repented of it, and courted Charles I. of England to interpose with his fleet, in case of necessity, if the partition should take place, which would give their republic too powerful a neighbour. To counterballance this treaty, which obliged Lewis to assist the Dutch with thirty thousand men, the imperialists seized Treves, and sent its elector prisoner to Brussels. Richelieu was now determined to push the war, which was likewise declared on the part of Spain; and, least a tenderness of Charles for his nephew, the exiled prince-palatine, should bias him towards the house of Austria, he fomented those factions, both in Scotland and England, which soon after cost that monarch his head.

but defeat
the Spaniards.

The marshals Chatillon and Breze commanded the French army that was to co-operate with the Dutch; and, on the twentieth of May, they defeated the Spaniards, under prince Thomas of Savoy, at the battle of Avein. Four thousand of the Spaniards were killed; but, by this time, the Dutch were heartily tired of their new allies; whose insolence, cruelty, and rapaciousness, were intolerable. When the French generals, after the battle of Avein, joined the prince of Orange, who who was then to take the command of the whole army, they were terribly disappointed in the congratulations they expected upon the signal victory they had obtained.

We have already hinted at the reasons of disgust which Vol. IX. Richelieu had given to the prince of Orange, who had brought p. 538. Charles to look upon the late alliance of his country with France, to be dangerous to the liberties, not only of Holland but of Europe. He was obliged to smother his discontent; but, though he was forced to make use of the French against the Spaniards, he took care to make Richelieu sensible of his resentment. The combined army stormed Tillemont, where the most horrid cruelties were committed, which, possibly, were winked at by the prince of Orange to render his new alliance more odious. The French, however, reduced Diest; and Louvain itself was invested by the confederate army; but the brave defence made by the garrison, and the growing dissensions among the allies, obliged the latter to raise the siege, and to march into winter-quarters. Those assigned to the French were at Ruremonde, and so wretched that six thousand of them were cut off by diseases. Their generals, finding this mortality more and more prevailing, and that the hatred of the Dutch towards their troops was implacable, set out for France in the midst of the winter; but they were unable to carry back above one third of their army; and those, naked, tattered, armless, and more like spectres than men: a damping presage to Richelieu, who had formed the most flattering expectations from the campaign.

Cardinal de la Vallette commanded the French army jointly ibid. with the duke of Saxe Weimar on the side of Germany. p. 169. We have already given a full account of the state of affairs Treaty and the war in the empire. Richelieu resolved to make Wei- between mar his friend; and not only declared him general of the France and French forces on the Rhine, with a subsidy of four millions the duke of livres, but prevailed with Lewis to resign to him all his of Saxe pretensions upon Alsace; which was to be erected for him Weimar. into an independent sovereignty. Many of the protestant princes of the empire, disliking the growing connections between the French, the duke, and the Swedes, formed an alliance with the emperor at Prague, for the defence of the house of Austria and the Germanic liberties; and, in the mean while, Lewis took the field in person; made the count of Soissons his general; and invaded Lorraine, where he took the town of St. Michael; but was persuaded to return to Paris, because his person was in danger of being carried off by the duke of Lorraine. To disguise the disgrace of this retreat, the count de Carmineil, who had advised it, was put under an arrest, and the count de Soissons lost his command.

The marshal de Crequi commanded the French army of War in sixteen thousand men in Italy, where Richelieu had formed Italy.

a new alliance with the dukes of Savoy, Parma, and Mantua. This was as unnatural an alliance as that with the Dutch. The duke of Savoy hated the French, but loved the Spaniards, and prevented Crequi from cutting in pieces the Spanish army, as it was advancing to the relief of Valence, which he had besieged. Crequi complained of treachery; but the duke of Roban, who still commanded the French in the Valteline, gave the Spaniards, this year, two defeats. Upon the whole, the campaign was unfortunate for Richelieu in Italy, as well as the Low Countries; because he had made extraordinary efforts for becoming, that very year, master of the Milanese. The truth is, the ambition of Richelieu was sometimes too headstrong for his policy; for he contracted alliances with states who had only a present turn to serve, and whose real views were incompatible with his. His state jealousies were likewise of prejudice to his administration; for he this year disgraced the best general that France had, the marshal Theiras, from a suspicion of his favouring the Spaniards, though he had served against them with the greatest glory.

Fresh

the French
court.

The ill successes of the preceding campaign, the vast expence that attended the management of a war in so many different quarters, and the murmurs of the people under the pressure of their taxes, rendered Richelieu more jealous and suspicious than ever. His difficulties were every day encreasing at court, and Lewis was now governed by him from no principle but that of fear. He had punctually performed his engagements with the duke of Orleans; and that prince's favourite had been created a duke and peer of France, and furnished with money to purchase the noble dukedom of Aguillon. The cardinal, to please the king, insisted upon the new duke persuading his master to consent to his marriage being annulled; but, in that respect alone, the duke of Orleans behaved with such constancy, though his wife was still in the hands of her friends, that the duke of Aguillon was sent prisoner to the castle of Vincennes, where he died soon after, as was thought, of poison. His death renewed the disputes between the cardinal and the duke of Orleans, which had almost proved fatal to the former.

p. 170.

The reader, in the preceding part of this work, will see the operations of the campaign of 1636, on the side of Germany; and which were so unfavourable for the French by their losing Metz, and an irruption which the imperialists made into Burgundy, that the cardinal was obliged to enter into fresh engagements with the young queen of Sweden, and to pay the landgrave of Hesse a large subsidy to detach him from his connections with the emperor. Towards the frontiers of France, the Spaniards took and demolished St. Jean de Luz; but the duke de la Valette obliged them to raise the siege of Bayonne when it was upon the point of falling into their hands. The French fleet, however, ever, under the archbishop of Bourdeaux, was beaten by the Spaniards on the coast of Provence. The Spaniards in Italy were generally victorious, through the backwardness of the duke of Savoy to improve the advantages he obtained, and by the death of the great marshal Thoiras, who was killed before a petty place. The duke of Parma, one of the allies of France, was driven from his dominions; and the French were unsuccessful in the country of the Valteline, where the duke of Rohan still continued to command.

The troops required to supply so many operations, were The Spaniards so numerous, that the Spaniards, under prince Thomas of Savoy, Picolomini, and John de Werth, entered Picardy; take Corbie where they took la Capelle, la Catelet, and Corbie, after beating the count de Soissons in passing the Somme. The officers who commanded in the two first places were condemned to death; and Lewis was obliged by the cardinal to disgrace even the duke of St. Simon, for interceding in behalf of St. Leger, who was governor of la Catelet.

Had it not been for father Joseph and Bullion, who was at Distress of the head of the finances, Richelieu would have sunk under Richelieu, those disasters. They advised him to throw off all appearances of jealousy towards the common people of Paris, who were loading him with execrations, because John de Werth, whose name was proverbial for his activity and enterprising spirit, was within two days march of their capital. Richelieu took their advice, dismissed his guard, and was followed with acclamations through the very streets where he had been execrated the day before; while the vigour of the measures he took for recruiting the army, raised it, once more, to fifty thousand men, who checked the progress of the enemy.

It was owing to this success that Lewis kept any measures who with Richelieu, towards whom he had observed a sullen escapes silence for some days. Richelieu had intended to have com- being as- manded the army himself; but the count de Soissons refusing assassinated, to serve under him, the duke of Orleans was put at its head; and, contrary to what the cardinal hoped and expected, the hatred that each of those princes had towards him, cemented a stronger friendship between them than had ever subsisted before. They agreed to take off the cardinal by assassination at Amiens; and four of their domestics were engaged to dispatch him as soon as the duke of Orleans should give them the signal by moving his hat. His heart failed him, and the cardinal escaped because he was a priest and a bishop; nor did he know of his danger till, after it was over, he was informed of it by the duke de la Valette, who was in the secret. The cardinal did not fail to improve the discovery for his own purposes. He knew Lewis to be excessively jealous of his brother, especially after being raised to the head of the army; and that the duke was equally distrustful of the king. The duke and the count, in the mean while, forced the Spaniards to repass the Somme; and, on the tenth of November, Corbie was retaken, and the two French generals returned to the capital. Richelieu raised a report that Lewis intended to put both the duke and the count of Soissons under an arrest, and both of them left Paris on the twentieth; the duke flying to Blois, and the count to Sedan. Lewis, who had never been easy while the duke was at the head of the army, was inclined to have proceeded with great severity against both; but the cardinal, who had trepanned them into their flight, made a merit, both with them and the public, of pursuing conciliatory measures; and the king pardoned his brother, upon the latter giving him a promise, under his hand, that he would not disturb the public tranquillity.

ibid. Richelieu, likewise, this year, dropped many of his haughty views towards the house of Orange, who had treated him with great freedom. This was attended with various advantages to the French as well as the prince of Orange; for the former reduced Landrecy and Hanau, and the latter recovered his patrimonial estate of Breda. The war in Germany went on with various fortune; for the French court protested against the election of Ferdinand, afterwards emperor, as king of the Romans, because the elector of Treves was a prisoner, and the elector-palatine an exile.

Vol. X. Duke Weimar beat the imperialists and Lorrainers, and the duke of Parma was obliged to receive the law from Spain; p. 329, the necessities of the state having disabled the cardinal from supporting the Italian league. This was followed by the evacuation of the Valteline to the Spaniards by the duke of Rohan, who could no longer pay the Grisons; but the French fleet, under the count of Harcourt, and the archbishop of Bordeaux, obtained some advantages in Sardinia. The Spaniards invaded Guienne, which was defended by the duke de la Valette, though he was under a cloud at court; and the duke of Halvin (afterwards marshal Schomberg) gave a considerable defeat to the Spaniards before Leucat.

Danger of Richelieu, On the side of the Low Countries, the cardinal de la Valette, the marshal de la Chatillon, and the duke of Longueville, in Franche Comte, were successful. The cardinal recovered the important town of la Chapelle, where Lewis had been very desirous of commanding in person; but Richelieu had his own ends in amusing him, by making tours through his dominions, attended by his French guards. This was the more necessary, as the duke of Orleans was again renewing his practices and intrigues with the Spaniards; but the king's sudden march to Orleans disconcerted him so, that he was obliged to accept of the terms prescribed by the cardinal, who agreed to the release of some of his favourites that had been put under arrest. Richelieu, however, at this time, found himself in danger from a quarter he had little foreseen.

Lewis

Lewis, though not amourosly inclined, had generally a from the female favourite, who happened at this time, to be one king's mademoiselle de la Fayette; and, by pretending that the confessor. passion he had for her was purely platonic, and an intercourse of souls, it was winked at by Caussin, the king's confessor, an enthusiastic, fiery, jesuit, entirely devoted to the queen-mother. This indulgence gave Caussin so great an ascendancy over Lewis, that it brought the cardinal once more to the brink of ruin. Caussin represented him as the usurper of the royal authority; the betrayer and persecutor of the queen-mother; the friend and protector of heretics; and the tyrant and oppressor of the French nation, by the immense taxes the people groaned under to support foreign wars and heretical allies. Those matters sunk deep into the king's mind, especially as they were pressed so vehemently by Caussin, that he undertook to maintain them in Richelieu's face. Lewis seemed to have little difficulty in parting with Richelieu, provided he could get another minister of equal abilities; and Caussin opened himself to the duke of Angoulesme, whom he had pitched upon for the cardinal's successor. He could not have made a more unfortunate choice, for the duke discovered all to Richelieu; and the king not having resolution enough to support his confessor, he was arrested, and sent prisoner to Quimpercorentin, in Bretagne. The dutchess of Savoy's confessor was put under arrest, and the cardinal made a public display of having recovered his power over the king, by insulting even the queen-confort for keeping a correspondence with the dutchess of Chevreuse. He ordered her majesty's papers to be seized, and she herself was obliged to submit to be examined by the chancellor la Sequier. Not contented with those examples of his vengeance in France, he continued to foment the troubles of England, where the queen-mother had found an asylum. Richelieu, to make some attonement for so many outrages committed by him against his master's family and his friends, this year instituted the French academy, which, at first, consisted only of forty members.

The year 1638 was glorious to the duke of Weimar, who War in almost reduced the landgraviate of Alsace, that had been Germany's guarantied to him by France. He had prevailed with the Italy's duke of Roban, after the evacuation of the Valteline, to assist him in besieging Rhinfeld, and the imperialists, under de Werth and Savelli, made several strong attempts to raise the siege; but their army was at last totally defeated, and themselves taken prisoners, and sent to Paris. This defeat was followed by the reduction of Rhinfeld, Friburg, and of Brisac. The last was so important a conquest, that Richelieu ordered the marshal Guebriant to offer the duke his own terms if he would resign it; but the duke rejected the proposition as an insult upon his honour. The defeat of the imperialists, imperialists, however, cost the great duke of Roban his life; for he was wounded in the battle, and died next day, to the secret joy of Richelieu. So many successes served only to strengthen that minister's authority, which he continued to use in the most despotic manner. He exercised power and jurisdiction within the dutchy of Savoy, and obliged the regent dutchess to conclude with him an alliance offensive and defensive.

and Spain. Upon the death of marshal Crequi, who was killed as he was reconnoitring the Spanish lines before Brenca, the cardinal de la Valette took his command, but lost Verceil, and the Spaniards remained superior in that quarter. Richelieu, to keep up the reputation of the French arms against the Spaniards, who he thought were favoured by the old duke of Epernon and his son, the duke de la Valette, gave the command of a fine army to the prince of Conde, who after making a considerable progress in Navarre, besieged Fontarabia. The Spaniards sent a fleet to relieve the place; but it was totally defeated and destroyed by that of France, under the archbishop of Bordeaux. Five thousand of the best troops in Spain were lost on this occasion; but the prince of Conde unaccountably abandoned Port Passage. The admiral of Castile took advantage of his oversight, and advanced to the relief of the place at the head of twelve hundred Spanish horse, and fifteen thousand foot. The French lines were forced, though defended by nineteen thousand veteran troops. The prince, and the archbishop of Bordeaux, retired to the fleet with what troops they could carry off with them; and though the utter ruin of the army was prevented by the duke de la Valette, who was still in disgrace, yet the haughty cardinal thought it concerned his own glory to have him tried, and condemned to lose his head, which he did in effigy, for misbehaviour; but he himself escaped to England.

Negotiations with Richelieu had made inexpressible efforts to raise the French marine; and his nephew, Pont-Courlai, with fifteen gallies, England. had entirely beaten the Spanish fleet in the bay of Genoa. Richelieu looked upon the naval power of England as the only obstacle of the French greatness. He employed d'Estrades, his ablest negotiator, to go to England as the French ambassador extraordinary, and to prevail with Charles to agree to a neutrality, while the French and the prince of Orange were attacking the coast of Flanders. He had this neutrality so much at heart, that he ordered d'Estrades to offer the queen of England her own terms, if she could prevail with her husband to agree to it. The queen, though she hated Richelieu, mentioned the affair to Charles, but she found him inexorable, and resolved to check the progress of the French power, both by a fleet and army, not without making use of some contemptuous expressions expressions as to the cardinal's person and abilities. D'Estrades informed Richelieu of this, and he vowed revenge against Charles and his court. "They shall know," said he, in one of his dispatches to d'Estrades, "that I am not despicable." He, at the same time, sent over his almoner; one Chambers, a Scotchman, with orders to foment the discontents in Scotland, in which he met with all the success he desired.

St. Omer, this year, was invested by the marshal de Chatillon; and it is said, that Richelieu was so weak as to order the siege to be formed upon the faith of a fanatic nun, who pretended that she saw, in a vision, the French beat the Spanish army near that city. Chatillon was obliged, by prince Thomas of Savoy, and Picolomini, to raise the siege with great disgrace and loss; for which he was confined to his house, and his command given to the duke de la Force; but the French general, Hallier, recovered la Catelet. The queen-mother of France was now heartily tired of her long exile, and employed Bellievre, the French resident at London, to write in the most pathetic manner to assure the cardinal that her ideas were now entirely changed; that she was resolved to resign herself to his will, and willing to live obscurely and peaceably in any corner of France that he should appoint. This intercession made no impression upon the cardinal. He wrote, in his master's name, a haughty answer, importing, that she was not to set foot in France again, and was to expect no favour from that court, unless she would retire to her native country of Florence. The French beaten.

Those insults offered to the queen-mother were not so dangerous as those which the queen-consort was forced to undergo. She was now pregnant, after being married twenty-two years; and it was reasonable to suppose that that circumstance must make her dear to the French nation. This did not save her from the outrages of the cardinal, when he discovered that she entertained a private correspondence with her brother, the cardinal infant, governor of the Spanish Netherlands. Richelieu's intelligence was so good, that he discovered not only that this correspondence turned upon the subject of peace, but that the letters were lodged in a closet within the nunnery of Val de Grace. The cardinal obtained an order from Lewis to search this closet, and entrusted the chancellor with the execution of it; but the latter durst not venture upon so daring an attempt. He privately gave the queen notice of her danger, and she removed her papers; but without being able to prevail upon her husband to punish his minister. The truth is, Lewis, at this time, seems to have had no will but that of Richelieu, as appears in his conduct towards la Fayette. That lady had all of a sudden shut herself up in a convent, where the king found means to converse with her, The queen pregnant, her, and discovered that she had come to that resolution from some harsh expressions the king had made use of towards her in an epistolary correspondence they had carried on. Upon farther enquiry, it was discovered that the king's page, who carried his letters, had always brought them to the cardinal instead of la Fayette, and that Richelieu had forged the king's hand, and employed many other indiscreet means to prevail with her to retire to the convent. All the resentment, however, that the king expressed, terminated in his dismissing the page.

and delivered of Lewis
XIV.
Vol. IX.
p. 172.

On the fifth of September, the queen consort was safely delivered of a prince, who was afterwards the renowned Lewis XIV. surnamed the Great. In the midst of so many prosperities, and some disgraces, the cardinal could not, without uneasiness, behold the progress of the duke of Weimar in Alsace. He was now as formidable to the imperialists as the great Gustavus had been. He might soon become so to France, his troops being in excellent condition, well paid, and deemed next to invincible. He had opened the campaign of 1689 by the reduction of Thun; but while he was in the career of success, he was cut off at Neuburgh on the Rhine, on the eighteenth of July, and in the thirty-sixth year of his age. His death was so critical, that no doubt was made of his being poisoned, and it is certain, that it was of infinite advantage to France; but to render it so, required the most consummate address. The dukes of Bavaria, Lawenburg, and Lunenburg, became candidates for the command, which he had left to major-general d'Erlach; and some other officers, whom Richelieu gained, though the imperial and Swedish courts offered them very high terms.

Treachery
of Richelieu.

A treaty was concluded, by which Brisac, and Friburg, were, in fact, given up to the French, though it was stipulated that half their garrisons should be English. It was natural for the elector palatine, who was then in England, and whose family had been sacrificed to the cause of protestantism, to aspire to the command of the Weimarian army; and all Europe was of opinion that he would be soon reinstated in his electoral dominions. Richelieu interposed, and the elector was arrested in France, when on the road to take possession of the command, which was purchased at an immense price from the officers for the duke of Longueville. This step, together with a subsidy, which Richelieu undertook to pay to the landgrave of Hesse, discovered Richelieu's real intention to shake off all dependency upon the Swedes, who, however, enlarged and maintained their footing in the empire by the amazing intrepidity and valour of their troops and generals.

Affairs of Savoy.

The cardinal, and prince Thomas, uncles to the minor duke of Savoy, disputed the guardianship of that prince with the dutchess dowager, sister to Lewis; and, by the assistance assistance of the Spaniards, they gained so many advantages over her, that she was obliged to receive French troops into Carmagnola, Savillan, and Querasque. Cardinal la Valette was then the French general in Savoy, but he died, after reducing Chivas, and was succeeded by the count de Harcourt, who likewise commanded the French fleet on that coast. Soon after, the dutchess had an interview with Lewis and the cardinal at Grenoble; but they could not persuade her to put Montmelian into their hands, or to send her son to be educated at Paris. In the mean while, the Spanish general, the marquis de Leganez, and prince Thomas, brought count Harcourt, and his army, into such a situation, that it was generally believed they must have surrendered prisoners of war, when the count, taking advantage of the Spanish slowness, disengaged himself by a most masterly retreat, to the amazement of all Europe.

It was about this time, that Richelieu came to a resolution to act offensively against the Spaniards both by sea and land; in hopes that their subjects in the Low Countries, oppressed by the government of Olivarez, would throw off their yoke. Salces was taken by the prince of Conde, and the court of England was so embroiled with the Scots, that Charles was unable to check the French fleet under the archbishop of Bordeaux, which insulted the coasts belonging to Spain. The marquis de Feuquieres, a French general, besieged Thionville, and was on the point of taking it, when he was attacked in his lines by Picolomini, the Spanish general, who cut in pieces or took six thousand of the French troops; and Feuquieres himself, being made prisoner, died of his wounds and vexation, in Thionville. To remedy those misfortunes, the marquis de Meilleray, Richelieu's relation, and military favourite, took Hesdin; and Lewis entering the breach of the wall, made his cane supply the place of baton of marshal, which was actually given him. The marquis de Chatillon, who had been unfortunate in the preceding campaign, regained his reputation in this, by collecting together the remains of Feuquieres's army, delivering Mauzon, and by beating the Spanish army near the river Aa, and killing two thousand men, besides taking some pieces of cannon, and three hundred prisoners.

That Lewis was not warmly attached to his female favourites, appears from his dismissing them as often as Richelieu pleased. Some of them were too independent, others too intriguing, and others too much attached to the queen-mother, or the queen-consort. Richelieu discovered his mastery over the king's inclinations by displacing them all, and substituting in their stead, Henry d'Effiat, seigneur de Cinque-Mars, the second son of marshal d'Effiat, who owed his advancement entirely to Richelieu's favour. Lewis, at first, had great repugnance at giving this young man a place place about his person, and at his being appointed master of the wardrobe; but he was no sooner fixed in that post, than he so entirely won his master's confidence, that the female friends of Lewis were displaced for daring to speak ill of him. He covered his natural disposition, at first, by a seeming attachment and affection for the cardinal; but he was in reality an intriguing ambitious domestic, and laid a plan not only for supplanting Richelieu, but for totally changing the system of the French government. At first, he faithfully repeated to the cardinal all the private conversation that passed during the easy hours of Lewis; and in this character he remained, till, upon the dismissal of the duke of Bellegrade, he obtained the post of grand ecuyer, or 'great master of the horse, and thereby he had the title of monsieur le grand.

An insur- We have already seen, how much Richelieu mortified the rection in court of Rome, by sending the marshal d'Estrees thither; Normandy and his quarrels with his holiness went so far, that it was generally thought that France would have emancipated herself from the papal power. The prodigious taxes which the cardinal, at this time, was obliged to impose for the maintenance of his foreign wars, created an insurrection in Normandy, which was called les pieds nuds, or Naked Feet, as the insurgents in general could not afford to wear either shoes or stockings. The chancellor Seguier was sent to quell it, with a commission, partly civil, and partly military; for he was attended by six thousand troops commanded by Gassion, who were the executioners of his will suppressed as a magistrate. He interdicted the parliament of Rouen, cancelled the privileges of their city, massacred many of the insurgents, and hanged, or broke numbers of them upon the wheel. After committing those and many other acts of severity, he restored the parliament to its function, and returned to Paris.

Progress Leganex continued to be the Spanish governor in Italy, of the war. and besieged Casal; but it was relieved by the count de Harcourt, who put five thousand of the Spaniards to the sword; and the secret treaty made between the dutchess of Mantua and the court of Spain, fell into his hands. Harcourt returned to Turin, where he besieged prince Thomas of Savoy, who was besieging that citadel, and he himself was invested by a third besieging army under Leganex. By the assistance of the viscount de Turenne, who conducted the French convoys, he conquered all difficulties; for he forced prince Thomas to surrender, and enter into a negotiation with Mazarine, who was employed by Richelieu on the occasion. The marquis Spinola besieged Salces, which was defended by Espinan; but the prince of Condé arrived in sight of the Spanish camp with an army of near thirty thousand men, to relieve the place. He was joined by marshal Schomberg; and, notwithstanding all their efforts, Spinola

Spinola retook Salces; but the duke de Breze, the French admiral, beat the Spanish fleet before Cadiz.

In the Low Countries, no fewer than three French marshals, Chaunes, Chatillon, and Meilleray, commanded. As the service there was, at that time, esteemed the great school of war for the young nobility of Europe, their army was crowded with Frenchmen of quality, and they besieged Arras. The cardinal infant, and the best Spanish generals, attempted to relieve it; but Richelieu sent a positive order to Hallier, who commanded a separate corps, to attempt to introduce a convoy into the camp of the besiegers. This was directly against the sentiments of the king, who was afraid, if Hallier should be defeated, the Spaniards might penetrate into France; but Richelieu was obeyed. Meilleray was dispatched with two thousand horse to facilitate the introduction of the convoy, and, in the mean while, the cardinal infant must have ruined the French army, had it not been saved by the return of Meilleray, and the approach of Hallier, which obliged the Spaniards to retire, and the place to surrender on the ninth of August.

The king was then dangerously ill at Amiens; but, on the Birth of twenty-first of September following, the queen was delivered of a duke of Anjou, her second son. This second birth of Anjou, endeared her more and more to the French nation; and Richelieu thought proper to procure a cardinal's hat for Mazarine, whom he intended to be his assistant and successor, in conducting the intricacies of foreign affairs, which became now perplexing. Richelieu, at the same time, made unusual advances to the queen-consort, but he was answered only by general compliments; and perceiving that the count d'Agli traversed some of his negotiations with the dutchess dowager of Savoy, he had the insolence to order him to be arrested in Piedmont, and carried prisoner into France. This year was distinguished by two interesting events, the revolt of Catalonia, and that of Portugal, from the crown of Spain; both of them occasioned by the indolence rather than the debility of the Spanish government, and both of them had great consequences with regard to France.

On the side of Germany, the Swedes being every where Campaign victorious, the duke of Longueville, who commanded the in Ger-Weimarian army, was obliged to act in a subordinate capacity many, to their generals, who always knew how to make a separate peace with the emperor, if they were deserted by France. This seems to have been the foible or weak side of Richelieu's administration. He had a contempt for the genius of his northern allies, but they overmatched him both in the cabinet and the field; for Oxenstiern was a greater politician than himself, and, excepting the viscount de Turenne, who was as yet scarcely known, none of the French generals were comparable to Bannier, Torsten,
and

and other great men who succeeded Gustavus in the command of the Swedish army. Guebriant relieved the duke of Longueville; and, in the end of January, 1640, the allied army bombarded Ratisbon, and beat the imperialists, while a negotiation at Hamburgh was going on between the two branches of the house of Austria, on the one side, and the French and Swedes on the other; but nothing decisive was settled at those conferences, which terminated in the famous peace of Munster or Osnaburgh.

and Italy. In Italy, the two princes of Savoy, negotiated sometimes with the French, and sometimes with the Spaniards, according as they could make the best bargain for themselves. The viscount de Turenne, who commanded the French army in the absence of the count de Harcourt, took Monte Calvo, and besieged Jurea. The Spaniards, after the count de Harcourt had resumed the command of the French army, marched to the relief of the place, under prince Thomas, and the count de Servela, who had succeeded Leganez in the government of the Milanese. After various operations, Harcourt was obliged to abandon the siege of Jurea; but, on the fifteenth of September, he took the far more important town of Coni, which was immediately put into the hands of the dutchess dowager of Savoy.

Revolt of Catalonia. Richelieu did not make all the advantages of the revolt of Catalonia, which might have been expected from his great hatred of the house of Austria. Instead of encouraging the natives in their design of erecting a republic independent of the crown of Castile, he suffered them to be persecuted, and branded as slaves by their own government. Despair, however, unmixed with any generous principle of liberty, obliged the Catalonians to put themselves under the protection of France; and the cardinal sent the count de la Mothe-Houdincourt to assist them. He besieged Terragona; but the French fleet, under the archbishop of Bordeaux, being beaten by the Spanish, commanded by Ferrendina, la Mothe raised the siege, and the archbishop, upon his return to France, was disgraced; but the cardinal sent the prince of Conde to reduce the county of Roussillon. In the mean while, Lewis, or rather Richelieu, concluded an offensive and defensive alliance with John IV. king of Portugal, and restored the duke of Lorraine, upon his making proper submissions, to his dominions.

A new conspiracy conducted by Richelieu, gave fresh offence to his enemies, against and a more dangerous confederacy than ever he had encountered, was now formed against him. The count of Soissons, who resided still at Sedan, with the dukes of Bouillon and Guise, were the parties, and had a promise of support from the court of Spain, besides being joined by the numerous malecontents of the kingdom. A flaming manifesto, as usual, was published in the name of the count of Soissons, Soissons; who represented Richelieu as the plague and scourge of his country. The cardinal answered it by sending the marshal Chatillon to besiege Sedan; but he was beaten by the count of Soissons in the battle of Marfee, where that count lost his life. The cardinal soon perceived that the confederacy was far more extended than he imagined. The duke of Lorraine had entered into it, and a plan had been laid for Richelieu's assassination at Paris. The rebel army was victorious, and there was nothing to obstruct their march to that capital. Richelieu knew where the strength of the conspiracy against him lay; and, under the pretext of a treaty for the exchange of prisoners, he sent Puissegur, who concluded a secret agreement with the duke of Bouillon, which entirely broke the confederacy; while that duke acted with such incomparable address, that he was received into high favour by Lewis. The dissipation of this conspiracy, which was the best concerted of any that had ever been formed against Lewis, threw a great damp upon the affairs of the Spaniards. The marshal Meilleray had besieged Aire, in Artois; and the Spanish troops being employed under general Lamberg, in supporting the Sedan confederacy, the cardinal infant found himself unable to relieve the place; which was surrendered on the twenty-sixth of July; but it was in so bad a condition, that the cardinal-infant attempted to retake it; and, during the siege, he died at Brussels. It was so late as the seventeenth of December when it was surrendered again to the Spaniards, under Francisco de Mello, the new governor of the Netherlands.

Whatever wars were carried on between France and Spain, by Cinque-Mars or whatever was their success, it is certain that the Spaniards Mars and had always a strong party, in the court of France, ever others watchful for Richelieu's destruction. He had obtained the duchy and peerage of Aiguillon for his niece, madam de Combalet, with full powers to dispose of it as she pleased; and, this year, another of his neices was married to the duke of Anguien, eldest son to the prince of Conde; but he was almost overset by the credit of Cinque-Mars, whom he had introduced to the king, and who was in love with the princess of Nevers, Mary Gonzaga. To please her ambition, Cinque-Mars, who, before that time, had only minded his amours and his pleasures, applied to Richelieu to be made a duke and peer of France; but having received a very rough, and indeed rude, denial, he conceived a secret, but implacable, hatred for his patron, who had likewise debarred him from a place in the council.

Cinque-Mars thought himself master of Richelieu's fate, its progress because of the confidence reposed in him by Lewis, whose complaints were so bitter of the usage he received from his minister, that Cinque-Mars did not scruple proposing his being assassinated. The boldness of this proposition had startled Lewis so much as to give a shock to the favourite's private private interest with him; and Cinque-Mars, to support himself, had made several propositions to the count of Soissons, the duke of Bouillon, the duke of Orleans, and other malecontents. He was not discouraged by the duke of Bouillon, and he entered into a correspondence with the duke of Orleans. He called to his assistance Fontrailles, and de Thou, son of the celebrated historian; and matters went so far, that it was privately agreed between the dukes of Orleans and Bouillon, to send Fontrailles to Madrid, to solicit support from the court of Spain. The duke of Bouillon was then on the point of taking upon himself the command of the French army in Italy; and Richelieu had a declared enemy in the person of Cinque-Mars.

Richelieu ever since his entering upon the administration, had, as the reader may observe, displaced all favourites whom he could not govern; but he found the interest of Cinque-Mars too stubborn to be ruined, and he persuaded the king to repair to the army in Roussillon, which had been formed under the marshals Meillaray and Schomberg, for the siege of Perpignan. The king consented with reluctance; and it was with difficulty that the queen-consort obtained leave to remain at St. Germain's, with her two sons, instead of being put under the custody of Richelieu's creature, Chauvigni, at Bois de Vincennes. Lewis was, at this time, in a weak state of health; but the ascendancy which the cardinal had over him, left neither him, nor his physicians, any will of their own. Richelieu found it dangerous, to trust Lewis out of his sight even for a moment; and, contrary to his usual custom, he made the royal quarters his own, during the march to Roussillon; which Cinque-Mars took so ill, that he intended to have killed him with his own hand, if he could have been supported by the duke of Orleans, who was absent. Lewis, at this time, as well the cardinal, was attacked by a dangerous distemper, but that did not hinder his majesty, after his troops had gained several advantages over the Spaniards, from besieging Perpignan, in May 1642. Richelieu was then confined to his bed at Narbonne, and Lewis being reduced to the same condition before Perpignan, Cinque-Mars put himself at the head of a party in favour of the queen-mother, and was seconded by his friend de Thou, who intended by her assistance to garble the army. It is hard to say what the consequence might have been, as they were opposed by the marshals Meillary, and Schomberg, and not countenanced by the queen-consort, if the king had not recovered.

The conspirators negotiate with Spain

By that time, Fontrailles had concluded his negotiation in Spain, from whence he and his party were promised to be supported; and, returning to France, he had an interview with de Thou, who pretended he knew nothing of his commission; but was now fully informed of its success. Richelieu had perfect intelligence of all the negotiation, and sent an earnest request to see Lewis at Narbonne, where he was still confined. Even the misfortunes of France operated for Richelieu. Don Francisco de Mello, had obtained in the Low Countries some advantages over the French armies, which were commanded by the count de Harcourt and the marshal de Grammont. The latter lost almost all his army, money, and baggage; and the account of the disaster made such an impression upon the weak spirit, and constitution, of Lewis, that he once more sought refuge in the counsels of Richelieu, as nothing now opposed the Spaniards marching directly to Paris.

The cardinal knew perfectly well how to profit himself of his master's situation, which, some writers think, was effected by his own contrivance. It is even said, that he prevailed with the marshal de Grammont to suffer himself to be beaten, that he might render himself the more necessary to Lewis. Upon the king's arrival at Tarascon, where the cardinal then lay, he was informed of every circumstance of Fontrailles' negotiation, and furnished even with a copy of the treaty he had made. It was not long before Fontrailles knew that all was discovered to Lewis; and after several fruitless efforts to shelter himself in Sedan, the duke of Bouillon being absent upon his command in Italy, he retired to England. Cinque-Mars, and de Thou were arrested, as was the duke of Bouillon. The certainty of this conspiracy confirmed Richelieu, more than ever, in his master's favour; and it was resolved between them at Tarascon, that Lewis should proceed to Paris, and leave the punishment of the conspirators to Richelieu. Of them, the duke of Orleans was the highest in rank; but he was too great to be punished, and he obtained his pardon by making the most humiliating submissions. Richelieu removed to Lyons, Cinque- where Cinque-Mars and de Thou were tried, condemned, Mars and and executed on the thirteenth of September; about which de Thou time, Perpignan was surrendered to the French arms. Richelieu laid hold of that opportunity to write the following headed, laconic letter to his master, "Your troops are in possession of Perpignan, and your enemies in their graves."

Soon after this, Richelieu set out from Lyons for Paris, with a pomp that could not be exceeded by an eastern monarch. A sedan, within which were all the accommodations of a bed-chamber, was constructed for him, upon a stage, which was carried by poles, on the shoulders of a score of men. As this machine was too bulky to enter at the gates of the towns and citadels through which it passed, breaches were made in the walls for its more commodious passage. The duke of Bouillon, who was, perhaps, the most criminal party in the late confederacy, obtained his pardon by surrendering his principality of Sedan to the crown; and Lewis was struck by a message from the prince of Orange, informing him, that if Richelieu should lose his credit at the French court, he and his friends would listen to overtures from Spain.

Death of
Richelieu,

It happened, fortunately, at this time, for Richelieu, that his politics corresponded with justice; and he made a most unmerciful use of that circumstance over the king's weakness. Being arrived at Paris, he proscribed all whom he had the least suspicion of favouring the conspiracy of Cinque-Mars; and he obliged Lewis, even against his will, to dismiss some officers of his guards whom he disliked. His disease, which originally was the hemorrhoids, had discharged itself upon his arm, and then into his lungs; where, notwithstanding the advice of the best physicians, it proved mortal, and he died on the fourth of December.

We have already given a sketch of Richelieu's character when he entered upon the administration; but he was a signal instance, that the same man who, in his personal capacity, may make a despicable figure, may be great as a minister and a politician. Richelieu understood how to make his master despotic; and he did it by a series of actions that shewed he was equally void of religion as of virtue. He must have been well conversant in the history of France, as he reduced its parliaments to mere money and judiciary courts; and imitated the example of Lewis XI. by bringing the great lords to the block.

Vol. IX.
P. 77.

Lewis was so far from discovering any deep concern at his minister's death, that he immediately released all the prisoners and exiles that had suffered by his order, or upon his account; and declared, that, from thenceforth, he would be his own master. In the beginning of the ensuing year, the count de Guebriant beat the imperialists at Kimpen; but Hallier was obliged to raise the siege of la Motte, in Lorraine; and prince Thomas, of Savoy, having compromised matters with the French court, reduced Nice, Verue, and Tortona. On the side of Spain, the marshal de la Mothe-Houdincourt defeated the Spanish general Leganez.

Though Lewis was now emancipated, to his great joy, from the tutelage of Richelieu, yet he continued to govern by his maxims with a very small relaxation. His brother, the duke of Orleans, lay under severe incapacities, on account of the share he had had in the conspiracy of Cinque-Mars; and it was even with difficulty that he obtained leave to return to court, where he was despised and disregarded, though Lewis, at that very time, was sensible that he had but a few weeks to live. The day after Richelieu died, his friend, cardinal Mazarine, took his seat at the council-board; and, though he concealed it, he became Richelieu's successor in the administration.

The marshal de la Mothe-Houdincourt continued to be successful in Roussillon against the Spaniards; and Hallier, who, notwithstanding his great merits, during Richelieu's administration, never could obtain himself a baton, because

cause he had once hesitated to obey his will, was made marshal of France.

By this time, Lewis found his health to be past recovery ; but he faced death with the greatest intrepidity and composure. Full of Richelieu's maxims, he had employed Chauvigni, whom he disliked during that cardinal's life-time ; and Mazarine introduced le Tellier to be secretary of state, because he was acquainted with the affairs of Italy. In proportion as the health of Lewis decreased, the difficulties of the government grew ; for, tho' he thought his queen was much more tolerable than his brother, yet he was puzzled how to settle the regency. His confessor, father Sirmond, advised him to associate both ; for which he was discharged the court. Chauvigni now possessed such a share of the king's confidence, that he determined him to leave the queen sole regent and tutorefs of his children ; but he declared the duke of Orleans head of the council and lieutenant-general of the kingdom. The prince of Conde was to supply his place, if absent ; and, when neither was present, cardinal Mazarine. Those, and many other particulars of the king's will being duly engrossed, were confirmed by the parliament ; and Lewis, before his death, authorized the validity of his brother's marriage with Margaret of Lorraine. By the same will, cardinal Mazarine was left, in a manner, superintendant of all ecclesiastical affairs ; but the queen could nominate to every office of power and trust, excepting that of secretary of state, which was to be filled up by advice of the council. The duke of Anguien, the eldest son of the prince of Conde, though not above twenty-one years of age, discovered so surprizing a genius for military affairs, that Lewis placed him at the head of the army ; but Hallier, now called the marshal l'Hopital, was to act under him.

Nothing now remained for Lewis but to die ; which he and of did, with most amazing firmness, on the fourteenth of May, Lewis. 1643, in the forty-second year of his age and thirty-third year of his reign ; a reign that may rather be called that of Richelieu than Lewis. When we say he possessed courage, we can add little to his character, unless we admit his docility under Richelieu to be a virtue. He obtained the surname of the Just by the suffrage of his people ; which is a strong presumption that he was, by nature, equitable ; but no prince ever reigned more uncomfortably than he did, for his inclinations and politics were ever at variance.
